Using authentic aviation discourse and descriptions of work related contexts and topics are useful. Activities for pronunciation of numbers, practice of read-backs and repair of miscommunication can be used for improvement of communication. A discourse analysis can be supplemented by workplace observations, interviews and questionnaires. The technique of discourse analysis can be used to develop materials for practice of pronunciation of numbers and read-backs, repair of miscommunication and improvement of comprehension. A useful activity to teach aviation pronunciation and vocabulary can be based on semantic and phonetic contrasts.

A material development for ground staff, of basic language features, experienced aviation teachers can use field observations and notes and collate them with real dialogues and scenarios. These can be distributed to aviation professional teams to determine the most representative and frequently used forms and functions, to be used for teaching. The testing of aviation English can focus on routine exchanges and unexpected radiotelephony, using representative authentic combinations of phraseology and plain language.

In view of the public safety which is involved in the aviation profession, the need for efficient and effective communication skills is needed. The purpose of teaching aviation English is that personnel should be able to operate in a minimum level of proficiency level, which is validated through research, especially of interaction during stress.

BUSINESS FOR MEDICAL PURPOSES-III

Topic – 187: EMP for Doctors

The need for medical English has never been as pronounced as now. The English speaking nation: lead in medical research and development, requirements for professional development and the migration of doctors to English speaking countries are factors which have contributed to the need and growth of ESP in this area. EMP aims to improve the English skills of non-Anglophone health professionals. EMI literature focuses on:

- Pedagogical/research enterprise
- Health care communication: Doctor – patient

English is the international language for science and medicine. Some have pointed out that this has resulted in the loss of national languages and spews inequality in areas of research and publication. A significant majority of EMP learners are overseas medical practitioners who have migrated to practice in English speaking countries. Various types of medical courses are being offered, which vary according to duration, audience, and medical specialty and in skills, genres, and medical situations.

A needs analysis shows that rapid reading, detailed study, and technical writing are needed by doctors doing clinical work with English - speaking patients and engaged in clinical work with English - speaking colleagues. Besides these, other needs are:

- Giving papers, reports/articles in English for publication and symposia
- Corresponding with English - speaking colleagues on professional matters
- Understanding lectures/papers in English delivered orally at medical meetings, symposia research has found that use of plain English does occur frequently in pilot/controller communication. Besides conveying information, it is used to clarify, check, and repair information. The use of syntactic, intonation questions to get information and the use of WH – questions are not approved phraseology, but are used when unanticipated changes occur. Full, direct questions are used to verify and elaborate the unexpected information. The plain language features are used to aid comprehension and are used for greetings and signoffs. However, such politeness markers and questions are not part of approved radiotelephony.

Topic – 185: Cognitive Load, Politeness and Mitigation

The question of cognitive workload and its impact on communication has been a continuing focus in aviation studies. The controller-pilot exchange is mainly carried out as radio communication which is part of the problem. The ability of flight crew to understand and manage radio communication is directly related to the cognitive load of other tasks that require memory and processing, like coordinating multiple procedures and sharing information with crew members. A high cognitive workload may interact with language proficiency to affect the ability of flight crews to interact with air traffic controllers. Several factors that contribute to cognitive workload are as follows:

Length of the interaction: Traffic controllers provide a load of information in a single turn to balance approaching and departing flights, giving instructions about level, directions, clearing, position, etc.

Prosodic features: of language pose problems of comprehension in radio communication for both native and non-native English speaking pilots. Neutral prosodic contours and rapid delivery typically used by controllers may contribute to comprehension problems in radio communication for non-Anglophone pilots.

Code switching: A linguistic feature often related to cognitive workload is code - switching. Under normal flight conditions, code - switching may be an intentional interactional strategy. Greetings, signoffs and expressions of gratitude are often given in the presumed language of the interlocutor, establishing a friendly conversational tone. In emergency contexts, code- switching appears to be a less end. Organization of a thesis is determined by the methodology being followed. Difference in discipline will also influence the organization of content. Even in a class of the same discipline, different models will be used; therefore it should not be taken for granted that the IMRD model will be followed by all. Students might be at different stages of writing within a homogeneous group, and teaching, therefore, needs to accommodate this range of development.

Students need to be aware of the disciplinary convention of writing of their area. Difference with supervisors' area of specialty can cause problems for the students. In such contexts it is important that the adviser and the students access examples for information about what is expected of theses in the disciplines that the students aspire to belong to, by using internet or by asking supervisors to guide them to relevant examples.

There are different expectations about roles and responsibilities of students/supervisor. These can be addressed in discussion sessions, where both students and supervisors can share their expectations about each other's roles. E.g. whose responsibility it is to select a promising research topic? Who assumes responsibility for the methodology and content of the dissertation? How much will the supervisor assist in the actual write up?

Doctoral students need to write regularly. Writing is the first step towards knowledge creation. The value of setting up writing groups for doctoral students has been acknowledged. The value of writing groups has been acknowledged for doctoral level students as it leads to an enhanced sense of identity, readership and community.

Topic- 181: Legal English

English is the language of commercial and legal international transactions. The term 'Legal English' has a variable meaning. The familiar term is 'Legal English', although 'Legalese' or 'Anglo-American Law' is used, as the following:

- ELP: English for Legal Purposes
- EALP: English for Academic and Legal Purposes
- EGLP: English for General Legal Purposes
- EOLP : English for Legal Occupations Purposes

Teaching of legal English for students of law and non-Anglophone law students is an important area within ESP. The purpose of teaching legal English is to enable L2 legal professionals and students to operate in professional and academic situations where English is required. However, there are various problems in teaching. Statutes, which are general legal laws, are compiled as codes, the acts of parliaments, and reasoning of decisions of complex cases by the higher courts, become binding law. Reading long complex documents presents problems to students of L2 not only in the reading and understanding these long, daunting texts but also because of different assumptions in the interpretation and application of these tasks.

Another problem is that the language of law is archaic, formal and mysterious because of the Anglo Saxon, Greek and Latin origins of the English language. Some see it as a desire for power on part of legal practitioners, their desire for certainty and also for making the legal language inaccessible for the general populace. Teaching BE to learners implies that they are either native students of law or second language learners. They have to be familiar with legal systems, practices and occupations in criminal and civil law. Business English teachers have to be familiar with legal occupations – Solicitors, Barristers, Attorney and Lawyers. Areas of legal language include:

- Language of contracts

of legal texts to develop their receptive and productive skills. Case reports and statutes are key genres and materials based on them can be used by students to model their law writing assignments on. Students need familiarity with generic structures of legal texts to develop their receptive and productive skills.

The problem question essay requires learners to consider a set of facts, identify legal issues, and apply the law to existing facts to a difficult legal problem, using the Model CLEO (claim law evaluation outcome) given by Strong (2003). The very nature of legal language can cause misunderstanding. This can be a disadvantage for socially vulnerable groups, as in the case of lawyer/client interview.

Topic – 183: Aviation English

Aviation English is the de facto language of civil aviation which is called Radiotelephony; it is a specialized communication between pilots and air traffic controllers, and other personnel associated with the aviation industry, like flight attendants, crew, mechanics and engineers. The difference with other forms of communication is that radiotelephony is carried out over radio frequencies and there is no face-to-face communication between the interlocutors. It is a hybrid language - a combination of a restricted, specialized, technical language and conventional English /other languages.

English is the language of air traffic control, officially mandated by the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO). The ICAO mandates that pilots and air traffic controllers must be proficient at Level 4, for effective English communication. Miscommunication is a cause of accidents; so pilots and air-traffic controllers are required to exhibit comprehensible pronunciation, intelligible fluency, and the ability to paraphrase in unexpected circumstances and sufficient vocabulary.

Discipline Specific Skills: This includes nursing care plans are areas which students find particularly difficult. The other discipline specific skills and tasks: are charting, change of shift report, interviewing skills to gather information, assertive skills to speak up in difficult situations, and the therapeutic communication skills.

Cultural Skills and Content: There are different cultural assumptions about mental illness, sexuality, concerns, and death/dying, which non-Anglophone students have difficulty in understanding and responding to. Cultural expectations in communication style cause problems in a multicultural medical team, e.g. in the West learners are expected to be assertive and self-directed, their lack of initiative may be viewed as lacking in problem solving and clinical reasoning. AREAS IN BUSINESS COMMUNICATION-IV

Topic - 193: Business English for Academic Purposes

English for academic purposes or EAP comes under the umbrella of ESP, and is required for those who use language to perform academic tasks or for employment. ESP is a needs based concept which aims to determine which language skills should be profitably developed for academic and professional success of the students. It is a broad term which covers the academic needs of native students (NSE) who need it for reading textbooks, research and presenting it for non-native speakers of English (NNSE). Business English comes under the heading of ESP as it aims to equip students with the language skills which they require for academic and professional success. It takes into account certain basic questions like: “who the learners are, what their linguistic background or level of competence is, what their view to language learning is, what their purpose and expectations are, what particular skill they will be needing in their actual, on-the-job situation”, etc.

English for academic purposes EAP as a branch of ESP is taught in higher institutions to improve the learners' proficiency in English language and to help them to overcome some of their difficulties in emotional state

Asking questions for information, yes/no questions, when to ask and how to frame question, is an important skill. Besides this, imperatives and commands, “cross your legs”, “bend your elbow”, “touch your finger to your nose,” and “follow the light” (Cameron 1998) are structures routinely used. In addition to giving commands, nurses must also understand explicit and implicit instructions given by doctors and nurse supervisors.

A pragmatic competence is using language effectively and appropriately. Inferring the intent of communication which is inexplicitly stated to find the patient's emotional state is based on knowledge of local culture. Strategic competence entails the ability to clarify meaning, checking comprehension, and demonstrating understanding and recognizing verbal and non-verbal cues. The sociolinguistic competence is using language appropriately according to the context. Interviewing skills for getting information about culturally sensitive topics, showing empathy, and adjusting speech in social interaction and recognizing visual cues for talk are areas where ESL students face problems.

The use of euphemisms both by doctor and patient to evade referring to taboo, embarrassing, distressing subjects, e.g. taboo body parts, bodily emissions, and death and dying. Referring to death is a difficult subject in many cultures, and has therefore spawned a number of euphemisms.

Metaphors are pervasively used in medicine. Particularly common is the metaphor of the human body as a machine, or a plumping machine and diseases referred to with the war metaphor. Medical discourse employs an abstract and distancing language, e.g. in case studies. This feature tends to employ an abstract, and distancing language in which the disease entity is foregrounded and the patients appear as cases in a statistical data. The following linguistic features are used:

Depersonalization: Use of impersonal vocabulary, omission of the agent, and use of technology as agent "Follow-up C.T. scan showed..." for deleting agent and taking objectification further. The use of reporting verbs, as in patients assigned non-factive predicators (e.g. state, claim, report) and doctors factive ones like (note, observe, record, find, etc.). The health communication research is limited. More directed EMP research is needed to improve medical practice.

Customer services require interaction with clients, stakeholders and multicultural audience to listen to inform, instruct, share, listen to complaints, and suggestions. When communicating with such diverse audience/readers, clarity is the main objective. This can be achieved by using simple words, and eliminating jargon. ☒	four

marketing mix

- Public relations
- Campaign
- Positioning

The marketing mix, which is made up of the four Ps of marketing:

- Product: Product refers to item that satisfies consumers' needs or wants.
- Price: Price is the amount a customer pays for a product.
- Place: Placement is about a product's market coverage and how it gets to market through logistic through company's distribution channels.
- Promotion: Promotion or advertising which may involve public relations campaigns, including in-store promotions.

142

In marketing communication, use can be made of marketing corpora. By simply typing the word 'market' in a concordance program, the different uses of the word show up. Vocabulary, from general to that related with customers, products and advertising, needs to be as follows:

- ELP: English for Legal Purposes
- EALP: English for Academic and Legal Purposes
- EGLP: English for General Legal Purposes
- EOLP : English for Legal Occupations Purposes

Teaching of legal English for students of law and non-Anglophone law students is an important area within ESP. The purpose of teaching legal English is to enable L2 legal professionals and students to operate in professional and academic situations where English is required. However, there are various problems in teaching. Statutes, which are general legal laws, are compiled as codes, the acts of parliaments, and reasoning of decisions of complex cases by the higher courts, become binding. Reading long complex documents presents problems to students of L2 not only in the understanding these long, daunting texts but also because of different assumptions in the interpretation and application of these tasks.

Another problem is that the language of law is archaic, formal and mysterious because of the Anglo-Saxon, Greek and Latin origins of the English language. Some see it as a desire for power on part of legal practitioners, their desire for certainty and also for making the legal language inaccessible for the general non-native speakers. In serious situations, pilots are more likely to use plain English to supplement prescribed phraseology, which might be problematic for non-Anglophone interlocutors. The use of formal syntax is non-prescribed and can cause problems of miscommunication.

Topic -184: Comprehension and Negotiation of Meaning

Negotiation of meaning is a critical skill in a situation where the flow of communication is almost entirely over radio channel, with no F2F contact. Comprehension is difficult when there is a rapid presentation of information as there are many aircrafts in approaching, landing and taking off positions at a given time. The air traffic controller has to guide approaching and departing aircrafts and convey multiple information in a single turn, for the sake of efficiency and accuracy. This flow is primarily from AT Controller to pilot, who has to respond and give read-back to ensure comprehension and accuracy of the exchange. For example, the controller would be identifying and directing pilots about their direction and speed and the pilot reads back, requests repetition for speed, uses politeness markers: 'Please' 'Thank you'

In air traffic communication, the question of cognitive workload and its impact on communication has been a continuing focus of _____ studies.

Cognitive workload and information questions to get information and the use of VFR – questions are not approved phraseology, but are used when unanticipated changes occur. Full, direct questions are used to verify and elaborate the unexpected information. The plain language features are used to aid comprehension and are used for greetings and signoffs. However, such politeness markers and questions are not part of approved radiotelephony.

Topic – 185: Cognitive Load, Politeness and Mitigation

The question of cognitive workload and its impact on communication has been a continuing focus in aviation studies. The controller-pilot exchange is mainly carried out as radio communication which is part of the problem. The ability of flight crew to understand and manage radio communication is directly related to the cognitive load of other tasks that require memory and processing, like coordinating multiple procedures and sharing information with crew members. A high cognitive workload may interact with language proficiency to affect the ability of flight crews to interact with air traffic controllers. Several factors that contribute to cognitive workload are as follows:

Length of the interaction: Traffic controllers provide a load of information in a single turn to

Topic – 178: Business English for Customer Services and Distribution

Customer services require interaction with clients, stakeholders and multicultural audience to listen to inform, instruct, share, listen to complaints, and suggestions. When communicating with such diverse audience/readers, clarity is the main objective. This can be achieved by using simple words, and eliminating jargon. The use of numbers, not bullets, and bolding of important points within the text adds to the emphasis. In journalism, the “lead” is the very first part of a news story, so it should not be buried between relatively unimportant texts. Eliminating extra words can increase reading comprehension by 10%. Use the customer’s name adds a positive and friendly touch to the communication. Longer paragraphs should be split into shorter ones, which can increase reading comprehension by 20%.

Doctoral students need to write regularly. Writing is the first step towards knowledge creation. The value of setting up writing groups for doctoral students has been acknowledged. The value of writing groups has been acknowledged for doctoral level students as it leads to an enhanced sense of identity, readership and community.

Topic - 197: English for Research Publication Purposes (ERPP)

The research publication phenomenon is on the rise. More and more researchers are wishing to publish their work in reputable journals. Competition for ranking in universities depends on the number of publications of the academia. Promotions hinge on how much research an academic gets published. It is literally "Publish or Perish" for them. It is also the requirement for doctoral thesis. English is an international lingua franca, so most of the publications are in English.

The disadvantages of publishing in English have been pointed out. Some argue that there would be a domain loss in certain languages with this emphasis on English as journals will stop using local languages. The inequality between NSE and NNSE already exists because of the language of publication being English. Because non-native speakers of English have to compete with native speakers, they are at a

Topic - 198: Curriculum of ERPP

The curriculum to prepare novice researchers in academic writing has two interlinked aspects of the discursive task:

- Creating and communicating the research through the RA
- Bearing in mind the needs of the gate keepers

Particular competencies are needed for this task. The student has to be familiar with structures of the genre - the prototypical schematic structure of the genre and its parts, according to disciplinary and journal variation. Expertise in using citation according to discipline is needed. These particular skills are in addition to generic writing skills such as coherence, cohesion, and argumentation in writing.

Strategic management of research and publishing is a skill required by students to manage their research and publications to fit in the assessment schedules, and the type and amount of publication for each rank required by their institutions. Also to keep in mind the following:

- Time for writing and for review
- Relevant journals
- Be aware about rejection, and the possibility of re-submission

158

A competence for publishing thesis-in progress has also to be addressed in the curriculum. ... concerns publications produced during the doctorate, a requirement which is becoming more and more common. One strategy is to use different parts of the thesis and structure them as a series of articles. Special skills are required in converting the thesis to articles and vice versa.

Another publication possibility is a joint - publication with a supervisor. In science disciplines, this is the norm, where papers are published by teams of people. Competence is required in dividing up the work - deciding who will do the writing, and so on. Writing for publication is an important contribution for

Topic – 182: Teaching Legal English

Legal English is difficult for the business communication teacher because of its technical nature. This technical language is difficult and full of archaic terminology. It is ideal that the help of a legal specialist be taken to carry out team teaching in which there is a language specialist and legal specialist and has been proposed as a solution to the problem. As in the Learner-centered Approach, using learners' knowledge can be an important resource for the teacher. Some feel that the solution is for the teacher to get a legal qualification.

Activities for teaching can include grammar practice based around preposition and c. There is a special legal lexis – register or specialist vocabulary. The key to teach legal English is to gain familiarity with common legal collocations – words that occur in natural partnerships, e.g. “Merry Christmas”, but never “Merry New Year”. Similarly, verb + noun combinations: Do you accept liability? And noun + verb: The Gap widened between them. It is important to give practice of prepositions, to use accurately as they change meaning. Learners can be given a bank of legally appropriate prepositions/phrases to memorize and use.

Legal register can be taught by using vocabulary lists, through activities in which texts using plain English have to be replaced by specialist terminology. Concordancing software also offers

- Consultation: presenting complaint to examination, and diagnosis to treatment

Various texts available give importance to listening and speaking, and the language for doctor-patient interaction. Cultural awareness, non-verbal communication and empathetic listening and intonation are other areas. The use of DVD recordings of consultation provides a solid base for student analysis and discussion.

Topic – 191: EMP – for Nursing

Business English for Nursing is a relatively new area within ESP which focuses on professionals' use of English in clinical settings and in nursing education. There are numerous textbooks for nursing published in recent years most of which focus on material for nurses entering the "Inner circle". The less recognized are English as a second language immigrants, and international students in the 'Inner Circle' countries who want to do nursing as their major in two and four year university courses.

A needs analysis of nursing reveals challenging issues which need to be addressed, e.g. objective, subjective and learning needs. Academic, discipline specific, cultural, and language related issues have been identified as challenges for ESL Students. Other needs analysis focus on language and practitioners, their desire for certainty and also for making the legal language inaccessible for the general populace. Teaching BE to learners implies that they are either native students of law or second language learners. They have to be familiar with legal systems, practices and occupations in criminal and civil law. Business English teachers have to be familiar with legal occupations – Solicitors, Barristers, Attorney and Lawyers. Areas of legal language include:

- Language of contracts
- Language of employment
- Language of banking, business law, and company, etc.

Legal language is required in dealing with a number of issues:

- Court cases: Criminal and civil
- Forensic
- Contracts with multinational companies

The need of law students is to gain familiarity with writing of contracts, corporate law, and job contracts. There are materials for teaching legal English available commercially. The methodology of team teaching is beneficial as there is a language specialist and a legal specialist.

Legal English is difficult for the business communication teacher because of its technical nature. This technical language is difficult and full of archaic terminology. Legal register can be taught by using vocabulary lists, through activities in which texts using plain English have to be replaced by specialist terminology. Concordancing software also offers opportunities to teach vocabulary. Online bilingual corpus, e.g. of English and Chinese can facilitate self-study. The use of authentic materials is invaluable in teaching vocabulary, collocations, grammar, legal occupations.

Another approach is to use Genre Frameworks. Students need familiarity with generic structures of legal texts to develop their receptive and productive skills. Case reports and statutes are key genres and materials based on them can be used by students to model their law writing assignments on. Students need familiarity with generic structures of legal texts to develop their receptive and productive skills.

The problem question essay requires learners to consider a set of facts, identify legal issues, and apply the law to existing facts to a difficult legal problem, using the Model CLEO (claim law evaluation outcome) given by Strong (2003). The very nature of legal language can cause misunderstanding. This can be a disadvantage for socially vulnerable groups, as in the case of lawyer/client interview.
