SOCIOPOLITICS OF BILINGUALISM

Topic No. 034-037

Introduction- Sociopolitics of Bilingualism; Languages in Multilingual Contexts; Multilingualism as Resource; Language Planning in Multilingual Contexts

At a societal level, whole groups of people and, in fact, the language or languages they use can identify entire nations. Language, together with culture, religion and history, becomes a major component of national identity. Researchers of bilingualism generally agree that language choice is an 'orderly' social behaviour, rather than a random matter of momentary inclination. For the multilingual speaker, language choice is not only an effective means of communication but also an act of identity. Every time we say something in one language when we might just as easily have said it in another, we are reconnecting with people, situations and power configurations from our history of past interactions and imprinting on that history our attitudes towards the people and languages concerned.

Diglossia not only defines a concept but also develops an approach to bilingualism which has been extremely influential. It originates from the fact that the co-existing languages of a community are likely to have different functions and to be used in different contexts. A distinction is made between High (H) and Low (L) language varieties and Ferguson noted nine areas in which H and L could differ.

According to Fishman, relative stability can be maintained as long as societal compartmentalization of language lasts. When two languages compete for use in the same situations, as in the case of bilingualism without diglossia, language shift, a process in which a speech community collectively gives up a language in favour of some other, may occur.

Language as a Resource

Multilingual countries are often thought to have certain problems which monolingual states do not. On the practical level, difficulties in communication are one. It should be pointed out that there is no scientific

ADVANTAGES AND DISADVANTAGES OF BILINGUALISM

Topic No. 044-048

Advantages and Disadvantages of Bilingualism; Communicative Advantages; Cu Advantage; Cognitive Advantage; Disadvantages of Bilingualism

Communicative Advantages

1. Relationships with parents and extended family: Where parents have differing first languag advantage of children becoming bilingual is that they will be able to communicate in each parent's pr language. Being a bilingual allows someone to bridge the generations.

2. Community relationships: Bilingual has a chan to communicate with a wider variety of than a ingual.

3. Transnational communication: One barrier between nations and ethnic groups tends to be la and bilinguals can bridge that.

4.Language sensitivity: Being able to move between two languages may lead to more sensiti communication because bilinguals are constantly monitoring which language to use in different sitt they may be more tuned to the communicative needs of those with whom they talk.

Cultural Advantages

Another advantage of being a bilingual is having two or more worlds of experience. Biling provides the opportunity to experience two or more cultures. The monolingual may experience a va cultures; for example, from different neighbours and communities that are using the same language b different ways of life. The monolinguals can travel to neighbouring countries and experience other cult a passive on looker. However, to penetrate different cultures requires the language of that cultu participate and become involved in the core of a culture requires knowledge of the language of that cult Semilingualism emerged from research upon _____.

semilingualism 2 of 9

From the early nineteenth century to about the 1960s, there was a widespread belief that bilingualism has a detrimental effect on a human being's intellectual and spiritual growth. The early research on bilingualism and cognition tended to confirm this negative viewpoint, finding that monolinguals were superior to bilinguals on intelligence tests. However, serious issues regarding these discredit the evidence.

Semilingualism

A bilingual who could not acquire full competence in any of the languages were termed as 'semilinguals'. They were believed to have linguistic deficits in six areas of language (see Hansegard, 1975; Skutnabb-Kangas, 1981):

1. Size of vocabulary
2. Correctness of language
3. Unconscious processing of language
4. Language creation
5. Mastery of the functions of language
6. Meanings and imagery

It is significant that the term 'semilingualism' emerged in connection with the study of language skills of people belonging to ethnic minority groups. Research which provided evidence in support of the notion of 'semilingualism' was conducted in Scandinavia and North America and was concerned with accounting for the educational outcomes of submersion programs where minority children were taught through the medium of the majority language. However, these studies, like the ones conducted also had to issues of power ( for example, the difference between language and variety) in society.

The differences between dialect and languages are made on the basis of size. Language is believed to be a larger repertoire of linguistic items and subsuming dialects. The difference be[illegible] and language is also explained in terms of their mutual intelligibility [illegible] here two languages may not be mutually understood [illegible] the dialect of a language might be mutually understood. Lastly, a language holds more prestige than a dialect. However, these distinctions are not inherent qualities of a language or a dialect. Dialects may undergo a deliberate process of standardization that expands its vocabulary and its functions to give it a status of language. Language formation is a result of a deliberate decision-making. Several dialects are not mutually intelligible while some languages are mutually intelligible but still considered languages. The example, Urdu and Hindi can be cited here. Hence, the difference between the dialect and language is related to the power and status of its speakers.

"A person having equal competence in two or more languages."

Vuhelpers24

Select the correct option

- ○ multilingual
- ○ balanced bilingual

Who is a bilingual?

The discussion revolves around how much proficiency in two languages is required by an individual to be labeled as a bilingual. A bilingual may be balanced where there is equal proficiency in both languages but this is a rare phenomenon. More often than not individuals have unequal proficiency in different languages across different skills. Usually this individual proficiency is in harmony with different functions associated with different languages.

Any construct of bilingualism incorporates within it a concept of language. This is again problematic because language definitions are also contested. Language is simultaneously, a linguistic, cognitive and social phenomenon. The linguistic phenomenon is evident in its structure and its composition of form, the cognitive aspect is related to the mental processes involved in language knowledge, while the social dimension is related to issues of power ( for example, the difference between language and variety) in society.

The differences between dialect and languages are made on the basis of size. Language is believed to be a larger repertoire of linguistic items and subsuming dialects. The difference between a dialect and language is also explained in terms of their mutual intelligibility i.e. where two languages may not be mutually understood by speakers, the dialect of a language might be mutually understood. Lastly, a language holds more prestige than a dialect. However, these distinctions are not inherent qualities of a language or a dialect. Dialects may undergo a deliberate process of standardization that expands its vocabulary and its functions to give it a status of language. Language formation is a result of a deliberate decision-making. Several dialects are not mutually intelligible while some languages are mutually intelligible but still considered languages.
