Attitude towards group membership varies in individualistic and collective culture. In individualistic societies the individual's achievements and self-actualization is held important and acceptance and willingness to have different opinions. In individualist societies the individual can express themselves freely. The listener pays attention to the speaker, and not to his/her group membership.

In collectivist societies, the emphasis is on the group and cooperation in shared activities. The individuals' own opinion is not expressed or if it is, then expressed indirectly. Care is taken not to offend group members by the free expression of opinion. 70% of the world's population is collectivistic. In such societies, conformity and loyalty are rated more highly. The relationship between high-context/low-context and collectivistic/individualistic societies can be seen in that high context societies distinguish between insiders and outsiders, and don't perceive people as individuals. Most individualistic cultures prefer low-context messages, while collectivistic cultures prefer high-context ones. The USA is a high context, while Asian societies are viewed as low context.

Topic – 228: Deconstructing Low and High Context Societies

Low and high-context societies can be viewed as how they interpret messages, which are based on their beliefs, values, attitudes, systems, and worldviews as well as in their social organization. Whether a culture is high or low depends on interpretation of these constructs. In high-context societies, most of the information about societal priorities is 'invisible'. What is important is never said directly, in fact, may never be said at all. Expectation is that others will understand their unarticulated me... contrast, in low-context societies what is considered really important is always out in the open.

Researchers have looked at other dimensions too. The way different cultures use non-verbal communication is particularly interesting. Here, we can look at body language (kinesics), eye movement and contact (occulistics), touch (haptics), and body distance (proxemics). If we look at speaking, paralanguage (the way we vary tone, pitch, and volume, and speed of talking) can also be quite different between cultures. So it can be turn-taking. Note, for example, how Anglo-Saxon speakers tend to wait until the other person has finished speaking before contributing to the conversation. In a interaction in Latin cultures, on the other hand, utterances tend to overlap, while in some E cultures, conversationalists may feel more comfortable with a short pause between utterances.

Topic – 242: Understanding own Culture

The cultural dimensions can be used to understand your own culture vis-à-vis other cultures. Cultures are often judged by the way they differ from our own culture i.e. our way of doing things. The dissimilarity between cultures basically influences intercultural communication and judgments are based on language resources. When speakers from different societies don't use their language resources as speakers do in our culture, it affects our assessment of them.

Ethnocentricity refers to the judging of another culture using one's own standards, beliefs. An Anglo-Saxon perspective may be to view projects as plans for the future, with clear aims, milestones, and deadlines. Yet this perception is colored by the fact that Anglo-Saxons, in general, tend to see time as a linear concept, with one event following another. A culture which views time differently may deal with projects in other ways. Individual objectives, for example, may be flexible, depending on fac outside the control of the project managers. Yet the project might still succeed because that c more holistic view and takes better account of all factors.

Topic – 219: Culture and the Teaching of Business English

In some teaching situations, experts are brought in to complement what the language teacher is doing in class. Others argue that the two areas cannot be separated, and that business English teaching and intercultural training are two sides of the same coin. After all, every time one of our learners uses English, it is likely to be with someone from a different culture, be it a different national culture or a culturally different organization. According to this view, it is up to the language teacher to deliver such training. As culture is linked to language and communication, the business English teacher needs to have awareness about cultural content, like other areas of BE teaching – management and business. This serves a two-fold purpose - business people have contact with incoming and outgoing groups and can influence both. They should know about their own and target cultures norms to avoid conflict and to create harmony.

Language is embedded in a culture in which it is used; some would say it is the product of the culture, therefore language teachers cannot be expected to know all the cultures of the world. Their knowledge will help their learners become more aware of the behaviors that will help them achieve their business objectives and avoid blunders, both inside and outside the company setting.

certain attributes of different cultures, although it must always be remembered that other cultures may see these attributes quite differently. The named dimensions are very useful for the business English teacher because they help to generate useful discussion and debate about relevant issues. The particular discussion formats and activities that teachers may choose to employ will depend on the group of learners and what they are trying to achieve. When planning intercultural training, it is helpful to have an awareness of the main dimensions of cultural comparison that are commonly used in the literature on intercultural training. Different researchers have arrived at a range of dimensions, which can at times overlap, as the following brief summary shows:

In a high-context culture, members use the context itself as a means of communication. This means that they do not need to explain things explicitly which are readily available from the situation, or from the environment. Often they use non-verbal behavior, value long-term relationships, and work with spoken rather than written agreements. In low-context cultures, things need to be communicated much more explicitly - people often appear direct and dislike ambiguity. Outsiders may find it relatively easy to become a member of the group. The business manager from a low-context culture will value long and detailed contracts, which are, of course, adhered to once signed. After all, that is the point of a written

The concept of Ethnocentrism is related to culture - the view that one's culture is the center of everything, and other cultural groups are judged with reference to it and are compared to one's cultural group. Ethnicity is also related to culture. Other related and important concepts are as follows:

Essentialism: The assumption that groups, categories have one or several defining features/characteristics exclusive to all members of that category and that there is an essential cultural identity for each cultural group.

Universality: The concept that features of human life and experience exist beyond the constitutive effects of local cultural conditions.

A Hegemonic view: A hegemonic view of things holds that values, experiences, and expe of a dominant group are held to be true for all humanity.

Topic -234: Equality and Hierarchy in the Workplace

Tolerance for expressions of inequities in the workplace varies from culture to culture. There are differing views about accepting power inequities. In Japan, consensual agreement is sought from all before changing policy or procedures, as they value harmony in the workplace. In Mexico, it is accepted without questioning that those in charge have authority and seldom will the juniors question about the implementation of a new policy. When workers and management interact, the US workers "have little difficulty in openly disagreeing with their superiors . . . inequality based on power of adults and of age.

Mealtime conversations in families show how power is viewed cross-culturally. In some cultures, deference is expected from children at mealtimes, in that asking questions, volunteering information is discouraged. In Western cultures, children entering conversations and giving information is seen as a positive thing. However, a comparative study of mealtime conversation across Swedish, Finnish and Estonian families found that Finns and Estonians spoke less than did Swedes.

Social class and education of parents play a part in the power differentials of families. As children grow up in middle class families, grow up to become equals with the adults and participate in conversations as equals. This strikes others as 'cold and distant', to people from other cultures. This point

"Forms of language not only reflect people's social position and the circumstance, but also express their view of the way society is organized and of their own position within the social network. . . The forms of language encode a socially constructed representation of the world" (Lim 2002).

Attitude towards group membership varies in individualistic and collective culture. In individualistic societies the individual's achievements and self-actualization is held important and acceptance and willingness to have different opinions. In individualist societies the individual can express themselves freely. The listener pays attention to the speaker, and not to his/her group membership.

In collectivist societies, the emphasis is on the group and cooperation in shared activities. The individuals' own opinion is not expressed or if it is, then expressed indirectly. Care is taken not to offend group members by the free expression of opinion. 70% of the world's population is collectivistic. In such societies, conformity and loyalty are rated more highly. "Putting yourself forward" is frowned upon. Perceptions of equality and personal freedom can vary -horizontally or vertically. The collectivistic society's emphasis on group doesn't mean equality. In India it is vertical with recognized divisions in society, whereas Japan is a horizontal culture.

Topic – 242: Understanding own Culture

The cultural dimensions can be used to understand your own culture vis-à-vis other cultures. Cultures are often judged by the way they differ from our own culture i.e. our way of doing things. The dissimilarity between cultures basically influences intercultural communication and judgments are based on language resources. When speakers from different societies don't use their language resources as speakers do in our culture, it affects our assessment of them.

Ethnocentricity refers to the judging of another culture using one's own standards, beliefs. An Anglo-Saxon perspective may be to view projects as plans for the future, with clear aims, milestones, and deadlines. Yet this perception is colored by the fact that Anglo-Saxons, in general, tend to see time as a linear concept, with one event following another. A culture which views time differently may deal with projects in other ways. Individual objectives, for example, may be flexible, depending on factors outside the control of the project managers. Yet the project might still succeed because that cultu more holistic view and takes better account of all factors.

Similar arguments could be made for almost all communicative situations in the business world.

Topic – 229: Five Areas of Potential Difference: Is Silence Golden?

Culture can be analyzed by using a number of dimensions. Five areas are usually seen in differentiating culture. The first one looks into how silence is viewed in different cultures. In some cultures, silence is favored, e.g. in Finns and Asians. In others, it is viewed as a breakdown in conversation leading interlocutors to get uncomfortable in some and to endeavor to fill up the sile some societies, silence is important. It is a way to guard your individuality and ward against th someone changing your opinion. This refers to a frequent conversational goal in Western soci each person to check out his sense of reality (or point of view) against that of other people in the conversation. Topic – 219: Culture and the Teaching of Business English

In some teaching situations, experts are brought in to complement what the language teacher is doing in class. Others argue that the two areas cannot be separated, and that business English teaching and intercultural training are two sides of the same coin. After all, every time one of our learners uses English, it is likely to be with someone from a different culture, be it a different national culture or a culturally different organization. According to this view, it is up to the language teacher to deliver such training. As culture is linked to language and communication, the business English teacher needs to have awareness about cultural content, like other areas of BE teaching – management and business. This serves a two-fold purpose - business people have contact with incoming and outgoing groups and can influence both. They should know about their own and target cultures norms to avoid conflict and to create harmony

Language is embedded in a culture in which it is used; some would say it is the prod culture, therefore language teachers cannot be expected to know all the cultures of the world. Their knowledge will help their learners become more aware of the behaviors that will help them achieve their business objectives and avoid blunders, both inside and outside the company setting

Topic – 231: The Face of Politeness

'Face of Politeness' is a technical term meaning attention paid to the self-respect of addressee and ultimately of oneself. It is about meeting a person's 'face needs' for self-respect. Not all cultures have the same idea about appropriate ways to meet face needs.

Everyone has two faces that need attention, a person's positive face and a person's negative face. A person's positive face is one's need to have self-worth recognized. The way to preserve someone's positive face is by paying positive attention to that person. In some cultures, positive attention can be such conversational moves as complimenting a person on his or her appearance or achievements. Another way is to use language that builds solidarity with that person (e.g. remembering the person's name, usi to include the person in your group). But how much such solidarity is welcomed depends on th A person's negative face is one's need not to be imposed on. Topic – 239: Verbal, Non Verbal/Paralanguage other countries, or look at CVs or tips for writing CVs, and discuss those. There are different ways in which news agencies of different countries report the same news, which can be discussed as well. Activities can be created by discussion between representatives of different companies – their procedures, contracts, dress codes and work hours. Groups from people of various organizations can discuss what is the normal way of doing things in their contexts? For example, signing of contracts, heading meetings and how long do people stay for work. If the participants are from other countries, it is much better. Discussion can be generated by how people talk about foreign business, travel, national influences and individual characteristics.

Researchers have looked at other dimensions too. The way different cultures use non-verbal communication is particularly interesting. Here, we can look at body language (kinesics), eye movement and contact (occulistics), touch (haptics), and body distance (proxemics). If we look at speaking, paralanguage (the way we vary tone, pitch, and volume, and speed of talking) can also be quite different between cultures. So it can be turn-taking. Note, for example, how Anglo-Saxon speakers tend to wait until the other person has finished speaking before contributing to the conversation. In a spoken interaction in Latin cultures, on the other hand, utterances tend to overlap, while in some cultures, conversationalists may feel more comfortable with a short pause between utterances.

Different cultures use metaphors in different ways (a good way of combining linguistic input with intercultural training). Discussion can be based on how English expressions involve different concepts of time, space, honesty. English expressions of time can be used to focus on how different cultures view time. What does it mean to waste time? How can a person run out of time? How is it possible to save time? Using sports metaphors is also a good way to generate discussion, e.g. is it possible to have a level playing field, how can we take the ball and run with it? The English language provides a rich source of metaphorical language which can be exploited in the context of intercultural training.

Topic – 242: Understanding own Culture

The cultural dimensions can be used to understand your own culture vis-à-vis other cultures. Cultures are often judged by the way they differ from our own culture i.e. our way of doing things. The dissimilarity between cultures basically influences intercultural communication and judgments are based on language resources. When speakers from different societies don't use their language resources as speakers do in our culture, it affects our assessment of them.

Ethnocentricity refers to the judging of another culture using one's own standards, beli

Anglo-Saxon perspective may be to view projects as plans for the future, with clear aims, milestone deadlines. Yet this perception is colored by the fact that Anglo-Saxons, in general, tend to see time as a linear concept, with one event following another. A culture which views time differently may deal with projects in other ways. Individual objectives, for example, may be flexible, depending on factors seen as embedded in social networks, and in group membership. In-group views dominate and the emphasis is not on individual's goals but in group cooperation. Intercultural communication differs in societies. Asians are seen as being timid and reserved while Westerners are seen as pushy and egotistical by other cultures.

Topic – 227: High context verses Low Context

There are many ways for our learners to understand the nature of culture, general or specific. Researchers and cultural commentators have identified different dimensions as a method of analyzing and describing what is happening. Dimensions are perspectives which allow us to measure and compare certain attributes of different cultures, although it must always be remembered that other cultures may see these attributes quite differently. The named dimensions are very useful for the business English teacher because they help to generate useful discussion and debate about relevant issues. The particular discussion formats and activities that teachers may choose to employ will depend on the group of learners and what they are trying to achieve. When planning intercultural training, it is helpful to have an awareness of the main dimensions of cultural comparison that are commonly used in the literature on intercultural training. Different researchers have arrived at a range of dimensions, which can at times overlap, as the following brief summary shows:

In a high-context culture, members use the context itself as a means of communication. This means that they do not need to explain things explicitly which are readily available from the situation, or from the environment. Often they use non-verbal behavior, value long-term relationships, and work with spoken rather than written agreements. In low-context cultures, things need to be communicated much more explicitly - people often appear direct and dislike ambiguity. Outsiders may find it relati agreement. For the high- context business manager, the contract may be seen as more of a guideline, to be used for further discussion if need be. After all, flexibility is paramount. Or imagine a situation where a visitor has arrived after a long journey. The high-context host might suggest that the visitor takes time to rest and recuperate, whereas the low-context host might expect an explicit statement of tiredness before

Question # 8 of 10 (Start time: 07:03:45 AM, 21 July 2023)

Using critical incidents in _____can improve our learners' intercultural competence through various activities, an understanding of their own culture.

critical incident

Collectivists need to alter their unmarked conversational strategies towards the strategies that individualists favor, and attempt to be more direct, assertive in stating opinions, and provide more verbal feedback than they normally do. While they may value periods of silence in conversations, they should recognize that individualists do not and also be aware of how silence is viewed.

Topic – 246: Critical Incidents

Using critical incidents in teaching can improve our learners' intercultural competence through various activities, and facilitate understanding of their own culture. It brings about increased awareness of cultural differences by analyzing critical incidents from different cultural perspectives. However, building awareness of cultural differences is not enough. Learners need to be able to cope with the differences, and to do this they need practice. One way is to move and live with the target culture. However, this is not practical in all situations. Critical incidents focus on differences from a practical not theoretical perspective. Sometimes learners do not find a solution, or perhaps there is no perfect solution. This is a reflection of the real world, and is not a method failure. The example can be used of an employee, m from an Asian culture to a South European one, might be uncomfortable with her colleagues touch hand/arm or putting their arms around her. How to deal with the situation? Another scenario can be employee moving to another culture and finding that the way meetings are conducted by the HOD in the new job, is quite different from his previous job. If he is promoted to be HOD, how should he conduct meetings? Another could be how does one deal with unethical practices in a foreign culture? The benefit
