Spring 2022 #Mid-Term

ORANGE MONKEY TEAM

Important NOTE:-

Maybe toppers are successful in school or college carrier but backbenchers are successful in their life because toppers run according to books while backbenchers don't follow rules and regulation that is why backbenchers are successful. For life, there are no books and another reason why toppers can't succeed because they fear failure and don't try anything new. Backbenchers don't fear failure as they have faced the failure in their school or college carrier so that is the reason they try new things and at last gain success.

As Abdul Kalam nicely quoted, "The best brains of the nation may be found on the last benches of the classroom"

Translation into Urdu:

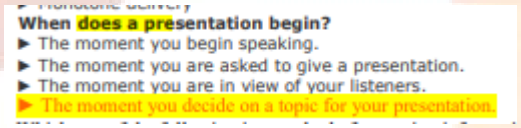

ہوسکتا ہے کہ ٹاپر اسکول یا کالج کیریئر میں کامیاب ہوں لیکن بیک بینچر اپنی زندگی میں کامیاب ہوتے ہیں کیونکہ ٹاپر کتابوں کے مطابق چلتے ہیں جبکہ بیک بینچر قواعد و ضوابط پر عمل نہیں کرتے ہیں اسی وجہ سے بیک بینچر کامیاب ہوتے ہیں۔ زندگی کے لیے، کوئی کتابیں نہیں ہیں اور ایک اور وجہ ہے کہ ٹاپرز کامیاب نہیں ہو پاتے کیونکہ وہ ناکامی سے ڈرتے ہیں اور کچھ نیا کرنے کی کوشش نہیں کرتے۔ بیک بینچر ناکامی سے نہیں ڈرتے کیونکہ انہوں نے اپنے اسکول یا کالج کیریئر میں ناکامی کا سامنا کیا ہے یہی وجہ ہے کہ وہ نئی چیزیں آزماتے ہیں اور آخر کار کامیابی حاصل کرتے ہیں۔

جیسا کہ عبدالکلام نے اچھی طرح سے نقل کیا ہے، "قوم کے بہترین دماغ کلاس روم کے آخری بینچوں پر مل سکتے ہیں"۔

Overcoming Communication Barriers

In order to overcome communication barriers it is important first, to recognize the most common communication barriers and then, understand their negative impact on communication.

Broadly classifying the barriers: there are three kinds of communications barriers, which are: Sender-message, physical, and listener-receiver. When effective exchange of understanding is not taking place, one or more of these barriers is getting in the way. When a barrier is present in a communication exchange, communication will suffer to some degree. The figure below illustrates the strength of the three barriers in relationship to our attempt to identify and reduce them. The figure illustrates that physical barriers are the easiest to identify and reduce or eliminate while the listener barriers are most often the hardest to identify and reduce or eliminate.

Acceptance of the responsibility of communication breakdown is quite a different matter. It is difficult to get anyone to admit that they might be the cause of ineffective communication. A sender feels that most communication problems are the fault of the listener or receiver. These people are not anxious to confess that they might be the cause of communication barriers. The same is true with the listeners. A listener feels that most communication problems are a result of sender or message caused communication barriers. They show little interest in accepting responsibility for poor or inadequate communication.

LISTENER BARRIERS

These barriers relate to the listeners mind set. Typical mind sets of listeners include not paying attention or daydreaming. The listener generally exhibits resistance toward the sender and/or the message. Listener resistance can also be characterized as uneasy communication, perhaps even confrontational communication.

Examples of listener barriers include:

1. Listener jumps to conclusions.
2. Listeners tend to see and hear what they want to see and hear. This usually means they listen to that which seems to agree with their own preconceived ideas
3. Listeners tend to reject any message that contradicts their beliefs and assumptions.
4. Listeners may have emotional problems that cause their minds to be preoccupied.
5. Listeners do not ask questions to clarify when they do not understand a point. They tend to fill in with their own ideas.

Listener barriers that arise in situations where communication is taking place for the first time usually happen by surprise after the exchange process starts. In situations such as disciplinary reviews, accident reviews or review of inadequate performance, the receiver may feel resistance at the start of the exchange process.

The title Listener Barrier fixes ownership of this barrier with the listener. Even so, it is the sender's responsibility to achieve understanding and therefore, the sender's responsibility to recognize and take action to overcome these barriers. Because the ownership of this barrier is with the listener, there tends to be reluctance by the sender and receiver (listener) to deal with (neutralize) this barrier.

Following are some reasons:
- Sender may not discover listener resistance.
- Sender may be aware of listener resistance, but not know what to do about it.
- Sender may dislike or be disliked by the receiver.
- Sender may be aware of their resistance and not want to do anything about it.
- Listener feels resistance and does not understand why.

No matter what the cause of listener resistance or the reluctance to overcome it, it is necessary to neutralize listener resistance to achieve commitment.

SENDER-MESSAGE BARRIERS

These barriers generally relate to style and content of communication, both of which originate with the sender.

Examples of sender barriers include:

1. Sender has not decided or specified precisely what listener response is expected.
2. Sender incorrectly assumes the listener has adequate knowledge to understand the message.
3. Sender uses words and examples unfamiliar to the listener.
4. Sender continues talking when the listener's attention has been distracted (i.e. noise, uncomfortably cold or hot, other people, dangerous objects, etc.).
5. The sender may say the message in a way that turns of the listener or may even antagonize the listener to cause a totally different message to come through than the one intended.
6. The 500 most commonly used words in the English language have 14,070 dictionary meanings. They mean different things to different people.
7. More words are used than are necessary to convey the message, which forces the listener to make conclusions about which words carry the real meaning of the message.
8. More than one issue is included in a single message, which confuses the listener.
9. Illustrations or examples used may not be appropriate to get the point across to the listener.
10. The sender may intentionally beat around the bush and never get to the point of the communication.

Sender-message barriers start to develop before there is any attempt to exchange understanding with anyone else. They continue throughout the exchange whether the exchange is written, spoken, or a combination of both.

The title Sender-Message fixes ownership and responsibility for this barrier with the sender. Oftentimes, there is a reluctance to deal with (overcome) this kind of barrier for the following reasons:

- Sender may not be aware of the barrier's existence.
- Sender, in a supervisory position, may feel that the receiver is responsible for understanding.
- Senders may be aware of their existence, but not know what to do about it.
- Senders may be aware of their existence, but feel that the urgency is too great to spend sufficient time to overcome it.
- Receivers may not be aware of their existence.
- Receiver may realize that a message is unclear or that the method or style of presentation is causing the barrier, but hesitates to take a risk and mention it to the sender.

©Copyright Virtual University of Pakistan

It is the sender's responsibility to achieve understanding and, therefore, the sender's responsibility to take action to overcome sender-message barriers and achieve commitment from the listener to respond as expected. Sender-message barriers are by far the most common barriers and contribute to more communication failures than physical and listener barriers combined.

PHYSICAL BARRIERS

These barriers usually relate to environmental factors that affect communication. In relation to the sender or the receiver of the communication, these barriers are neutral. They are not originated by the sender or the receiver.

Common examples include:

1. Noise may make hearing difficult.
2. Listener hearing loss.
3. The temperature is uncomfortably cold or hot.
4. The communication may be taking place where there is danger.
5. Distracting activities may be going on nearby.

Physical or environmental barriers most often begin at the start of the communication exchange. They are usually fairly obvious and because they are neutral, there is not risk to anyone's ego for either the sender or receiver to mention physical barriers when they exist. It usually is a very simple matter to overcome them once they are acknowledged.

Even though physical barriers are neutral, and even though listeners commonly initiate action to overcome them, it is the sender's responsibility to achieve understanding. It is, therefore, the sender's responsibility to initiate action to overcome physical barriers to achieve commitment from the listener to respond as expected.

Barriers that stop you from communicating with people around you

Here is a list of barriers to communication, or reasons why we sometimes find it difficult to take the risk and communicate our true attitudes and feelings to one another. Tick the ones you see as relevant in your relationship.

- Fear of appearing low in the listener's eyes.
- Fear of exposing your feelings and weaknesses.
- Fear of hurting others or getting hurt.
- Fear of being rejected, blamed, or condemned.
- Fear of not receiving a positive response.
- Fear of a potential conflict.
- Fear of risking self-disclosure.
- Fear of appearing self-centre.
- Fear of appearing stupid.
- Fear of not being taken seriously.
- Fear of not getting the help you think you need.
- Fear of ruining a good situation.

Lesson 12

Speech

A key rule to make a good speech is to keep in mind that audiences care most about things that directly affect them. An effective speaker understands the nature of audiences and adapts speeches to audiences. In order to do this, you must learn everything you can about your particular audience. Then make sure to keep the audience in mind in every decision you make in the speech development process. When you plan your speech this way, you engage in "audience-Centered" approach, which is vital for success.

When centering on the audience, you start by finding common traits that enable you to identify with them. Since audiences are concerns with things that they believe will directly affect them, it's your job to find as many different ways that your topic relates to your particular audience. The more ways you can find to connect with the audience, the more reasons they have to listen to you. Whenever possible, you will want to obtain the following information about the audience and the location where you will be speaking.

Using the word "A-U-D-I-E-N-C-E" as an acronym, you can get the survey done for the audience analysis.

A-udience: Who are the members? How many will be there at the event? Size of the meeting? Formal or informal meeting? A larger audience also means that you may have to work with a microphone and that you may need some way of making your visual aids large enough to be seen.

U-understanding: What is their (audience) knowledge about the topic? How much does the audience know about the topic? If they know nothing, you have to worry about getting over their heads. If they know a lot, you will have to worry about not boring them.

D-demographic Factors:

Age An audience in their 20's will have different interests and motivations than one in their 70's.

Education levels Is your audience filled with people holding advanced degrees, or are they mainly high school graduates?

Occupation What does your audience do for a living? Do they all share similar jobs or work for the same company? Can you somehow connect your topic to their jobs?

Gender While gender differences may be diminishing, it is important to know the gender balance of the audience. For example, it would be a good bet that a speech that uses only examples from sports would be less effective for an all female audience.

Marital status Is your audience mainly married or single? These groups will have different values and motivations. How about children? Some issues, like safety, become more important to audience members who are parents than an audience composed of single people.

Religion Does a majority of the audience share certain types of religious beliefs? Knowing this ahead of time can avoid offending people based on their faith. For example, using quotations from the bible might not be very effective for an audience composed of mainly of Muslims. In addition, don't make the mistake of assuming that just because your audience is American that it will be a Christian audience.

Racial/cultural/ethnic background Stereotyping can lead to problems such as patronizing the audience, but it is helpful to know if the audience shares any racial, cultural, or ethnic similarities. For example, is your audience rural or urban? You always want to be sensitive and respectful.

Group membership Are there any specific groups that your audience might belong to? For example, if a majority of the audience belongs to an Engineering Association, then you will want to take special care discussing a controversial issue concerning the organization.

Hobbies/Interests Does your audience share any hobbies or interests? If so this gives you a way to find common ground. For example, if the audience is composed of people who all share a passion for computers, then using examples from the computer industry will strike a common chord in the audience.

Interest: Who asked the audience to be there? Why will they be at the event? Why is the audience attending the particular occasion? Will the audience be coming voluntarily or will they be required to attend? An audience whose attendance is mandatory would require you to convince them that your speech is worth their attention. Is the audience naturally interested in your topic? Or will you have to find ways to make it interesting to them? If they normally would not find the topic interesting, then you will have to put some work into adjusting the topic to their interest.

Environment: Where will you stand when you speak? Will everyone be able to see you?

©Copyright Virtual University of Pakistan

Formal or informal setting: Are you going to speak in a formal lecture hall or a banquet hall? Will you be standing up at a meeting? The formality of the setting will have a definite effect on the expectations of the audience and also how you should approach your speech.

Seating and Visibility: How physically close are you to the audience will affect how close you can get to them psychologically. How will the audience be seated? Will you be speaking from an elevated level? Are there any obstructions that will keep the audience from seeing you or your visual aids?

Temperature: The temperature of the room will have a major effect on the audience. If the room is too warm, then the audience will have an increased tendency to be lethargic and sleepy. If the room is too cold, they will be constantly shivering and shifting in their seats. In either case you should not plan on a long speech or add a lot of attention getting devices to keep the audience tuned in.

Distraction: Noises cause distraction. A large window, where people will be passing by, could be another reason of audience's distraction. An interesting wall decoration in the meeting hall could be another.

N-eeds: What are the listeners' needs? What are your needs? What are the needs of the person or the organization that hired you?

C-ustomized: How can I custom fit my message to the audience?

E-xpectations: What do the listeners expect to learn from me? What does the audience expect of you on the occasion?

Lesson 13

Selecting a Topic

The topic is an often overlooked part of a speech. This is a grave mistake because your topic is the first part of a speech with which the audience comes into contact.

To select a good topic, follow the guidelines below:

- A topic should be appealing.

In other words, a topic itself should be interesting, and that it should make people want to hear your speech

- A topic should be intriguing.

A topic should tell the audience just enough about your speech to get them wondering what it is going to be about.

- A topic should not tell too much about a speech.

Simply stating the subject matter is not a good idea for a topic. Something like, "Money Politics" or "International Trade" not only tells the audience what the speech is going to be about, but they also suggest the reasoning and the conclusion.

- A topic should be an integral part of a speech.

Although this is not an absolute requirement, I think it shows good form if you can somehow work your topic into your speech; e.g., going back to your topic at the conclusion of the speech, or even closing the speech by repeating the topic.

- A topic should not be too vague.

A problem which has become common or too much has already been talked about. For example, co-education, corruption.

Rules of Finding a Topic of Speech

In real life your topics will be determined by the situation or your boss. For example, you may be asked to give a presentation about how to fund a new project or you may be asked to speak at an awards banquet for writers. In other cases, such as an after-dinner speech, you may choose your own topic.

Begin early

Deciding on a topic early will give you more time to prepare and think, both consciously and unconsciously, about what you want to say. Although beginning early may cause initial stress that could be alleviated by procrastination, an early start will lower your stress level when you give your speech--when you really need to be as relaxed as possible.

Choose a topic you're interested in

If you are bored with or not interested in the topic, your audience will be even more bored--not because of the topic, but because of how you present it. Chances are, your lack of interest will show, and you will lack credibility. On the other hand, many people make the mistake of thinking that people are not interested in what they are interested in. This may be true, but a dynamic presentation can get people interested.

Select a topic you know about or easily research

Make certain that you choose a topic that is easily researchable. Research is becoming easier as a result of computer assisted communications such as the World Wide Web.

©Copyright Virtual University of Pakistan

Researching Your Topic

As you begin to work on your informative speech, you will find that you need to gather additional information. Your instructor will most likely require that you locate relevant materials in the library and cite those materials in your speech.

A number of strategies and techniques can be used to gather and organize source materials for your speech.

Gathering Materials

Gathering materials can be a daunting task. You may want to do some research before you choose a topic. Once you have a topic, you have many options for finding information. You can conduct interviews, write or call for information from a clearinghouse or public relations office, and consult books, magazines, journals, newspapers, television and radio programs, and government documents. The library will probably be your primary source of information. You can use many of the libraries databases or talk to a reference librarian to learn how to conduct efficient research.

Taking notes

While doing your research, you may want to carry note-cards. When you come across a useful passage, copy the source and the information onto the note-card or copy and paste the information. You should maintain a working bibliography as you research so you always know which sources you have consulted and so the process of writing citations into the speech and creating the bibliography will be easier. You'll need to determine what information-recording strategies work best for you. Talk to other students, instructors, and librarians to get tips on conducting efficient research. Spend time refining your system and you will soon be able to focus on the information instead of the record-keeping tasks.

Sources of material research: Books, encyclopedias, yearbooks, Periodicals (journals, magazines, newspapers), government publications, computerized databases

Journals publish articles written by scholars and researchers. Journals are often published by professional associations. Articles in journals usually include bibliographies.

Magazines publish articles written for a general audience. Articles in magazines rarely include bibliographies.

Newspapers, like journals and magazines, are a type of periodical. Periodical indexes allow you to find articles from newspapers. A search of a periodical index results in citations. Citations identify the actual articles.

In general, there are three kinds of newspaper indexes:

Individual newspaper indexes;

Newspaper indexes that include more than one newspaper;

General periodical indexes that include one or more newspapers, and often include the full-text of newspaper articles.

Newspaper and Magazine Articles: Journals and magazines usually provide the most current information on a topic. Journal articles are more scholarly or professional while magazine articles tend to be shorter and more general. Newspaper articles, while not usually scholarly or professional, can give you the most current news and some additional facts on your topic.

Books: Books can provide a broad overview of a topic or in-depth information. You can search for books by author, title, subject, or keyword. It is often best to do a Word search to find books on your topic.

Periodicals: Also called serials are publications printed in intervals that continue to be printed for an indefinite period of time. Journals, magazines, and newspapers are types of periodicals.

Citation: A citation is a reference to a source used in an article, essay, book, etc.

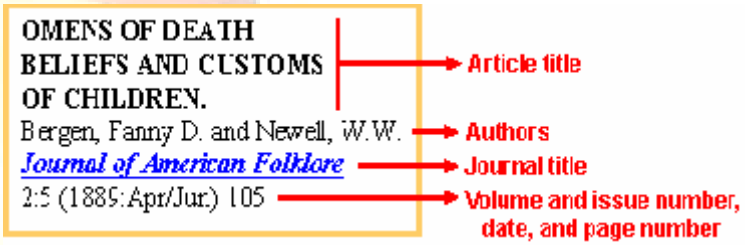

In most periodical indexes, citations include the following information:

Author
Article title
Journal or magazine title
Volume number of the journal or magazine
Date of publication
Page number of the beginning of the article

Section or column number (for newspaper citations)
In some periodical indexes, citations include abstracts. Abstracts are brief summaries of articles.
Periodical indexes: Also called research databases allow you to find articles from journals and magazines. A search of a periodical index results in citations. Citations identify the actual articles.

Electronic Periodical Indexes: Electronic periodical indexes (also called research databases) are available via the World Wide Web, CD-ROM, and online systems.

(IMPORTANT Note for Ms. Saba: Pl. get the matter in the box changed as follows:
Researching the Topic ….. as Article Title
M. Nazim ..... as Author
Journal of Speech Writing …as Journal Title
(1889 Apr/Jan) 105... as Volume & Issue Number)

2:5 = volume 2, issue 5
1889 = year of publication
Apr/Jun = months of publication
(This journal was published 6 times per year.)
105 = first page of the article

Reference librarians: Virtually every library has a librarian designated as a reference librarian. Librarians in general are helpful, but helping you research is the specific job of the reference librarian, who would happily answer questions or offer research suggestions.

Keep organized notes: Keep your notes in an outline form, or any form that you'll be able to easily find later. You don't have to get overly organized about it; just have well-marked notebooks or files with clearly defined categories.

Plan your time for the research: For most topics, you could go on and on, and research right up until the moment you have to give the speech. But decide on a time when you stop researching and actually create the speech.

Stay organized & build your note files: There is one important technique to staying organized so that you can find information quickly when writing: Organize as you go. Build your note files as you go. To do this, have a separate folder for research. Then create sub-folders.
Your notes should be a trail that always leads inevitably to the information you need. There's nothing worse than not being able to find important information because it's not in the correct folder or file. Use logic. Take the broadest categories and break them down.
For example, if you desire delivering a speech on "public speaking", make a folder called "public speaking basic speech." Then a subfolder labeled "all techniques." As you gather more information, divide the folder further into subfolders called "stage fright techniques and causes," "general public speaking techniques" and "acting techniques."
The idea is to have your search lead inevitably to the information you need, so title the folders and subfolders for easy recognition and retrieval. Be specific with the titles of the subfolders. The additional benefit is that when you have files and folders with specific names on them, the speech virtually writes itself. For one version of the speech, you'll be able to take certain sections, and leave certain files for another speech.

©Copyright Virtual University of Pakistan

Narrowing/refining your research topic (Time period, geographic region or country, particular aspect). A topic that covers too much material is a common problem for students. Depending on your interests, a general topic can be focused in many ways. For example, if you want to do a paper on government funding of the arts, consider the following questions:

What do you already know about this subject?

Is there a specific time period you want to cover?

Is there a geographic region or country on which you would like to focus?

Is there a particular aspect of this topic that interests you? For example, public policy implications, historical influence, sociological aspects, psychological angles, specific groups or individuals involved in the topic, etc.

Lesson 14

Thesis Statement

What is a thesis statement? A thesis statement is a declarative statement in sentence form. It is a complete thought; it is not a question. It is a simple sentence that makes a statement or expresses an attitude, opinion, condition, position, or feeling about the subject.

Suppose you begin with a topic, the general subject matter, and, after considering your audience and researching your subject, you formulate a statement about the topic. For example:

Topic: Fast foods
Thesis: Fast foods are a serious problem for heart patients

You have made a complete declarative statement. This statement expresses a condition about the relationship that exists between fast foods and heart patients. However, consider the next example.

Topic: Fast foods
Thesis: Does fast foods cause a serious problem for heart patients?

This sentence is not a thesis statement. It does not express a feeling, condition, opinion, or an attitude. The sentence is a question; it does not declare or tell anything -- it only asks. This sentence would not give focus to your message for the audience. It would only pose more questions.

The thesis statement, then, is a complete declarative sentence that expresses an opinion, condition, value, attitude, or feeling.

Purpose of the thesis

What is the purpose of the thesis sentence in a communication situation? Why is one necessary? A thesis statement is the focus of the speech, lecture, conversation, or discussion. It is the main idea or purpose of the entire message, expressed in a single sentence.
For example:

Topic: Inflation
Thesis: Inflation has seriously affected the housing market.

The entire speech, then, should be spent developing the thesis. You should show how the housing market has been seriously affected by inflation, Every statement, fact, opinion and example expressed should be concerned with developing the concept that inflation has affected the housing market.

Appropriateness of the thesis

The thesis must not only be a declarative sentence; it should also be appropriate for the audience. Formulate a thesis that you are interested in and well informed about, and also one that will interest and inform the audience. Will the thesis be new and interesting to them, or are your going to "inform" the audience about something they already know?

Is your thesis appropriate for the occasion and place? A topic and thesis might be interesting but simply not appropriate for the audience at that particular time. Selecting a thesis that is inappropriate constitutes a failure to adapt to the audience.

Scope of the thesis
Next ask yourself if the thesis is well designed. You have already partially answered this question if you have considered the level of interest and of prior information of your audience.

You should also consider the scope of your thesis sentence. Have you limited the thesis adequately? Do you have the time and information necessary to discuss the thesis you have designed? Is your thesis too general and too broad to be of interest or to be informative to the audience?

For example, you have been assigned to present an 8- to 10-minute persuasive speech. You select and research your topic. You formulate the thesis: "Inflation is a serious problem in this country." Is your thesis well designed? No, because the thesis is too broad. How could you develop and support this thesis in 8 to 10 minutes? The sentence needs to be limited, and it could be limited in a variety of ways, such as:

Inflation is a serious problem for:

- the young married
- the farmer
- the housewife

The list is endless. How many specific groups can you add to the list?

After thinking of all the possible ways to complete the statement, you can see just how broad the original thesis is, and how impossible it would be to develop it effectively for the audience.

Concreteness of the thesis

Besides being limited in scope, a thesis must also be concrete in its wording. For example, the thesis "Preventive dentistry is good" is, not well designed. This thesis needs to be more concrete. "Good" is a vague term; it needs definition. A more effective thesis for our audience might be: Preventive dentistry is an effective means of controlling tooth decay:" This statement indicates why preventive dentistry is important.

Development of the thesis

After you have formulated your thesis statement, the next step is to develop it by stating your main points. Suppose your thesis is “Improving communication skills are essential for every business student.” What are your reasons for making this statement - good communication skills help make good presentations, improved communication ensures future success? Your reasons for believing that improving communication skills are essential for every business student are your main points and are the means of developing your speech for the audience.

Your main points should always be:

- Clear
- Logical
- Equal in value
- Distinct
- Central to the issue

Clarity

Are your main points clearly worded? Have you used simple terms? Are the words concrete and precise? Are you constructing simple sentences?

It is important to make your reasons clear for the audience. For example, if the thesis statement is

"Everyone should take a first-aid course in high school" a clear reason, stated concretely in a simple sentence, might be:

Students need courses that have a practical application.

A reason that is not as clear, concrete, or simply constructed would be:

> Students need not only theatrical courses, but also they need courses that are practical and have direct correlation with their lives and immediate situations.

Which statement would the audience more readily understand?

Logic

Are your reasons logical? Will they make sense to the audience? Will they seem reasonable to them? Will it be apparent to the audience that your reasons follow logically from your thesis?

If your thesis is "Everyone should take a first-aid course in high school," two logical, reasonable statements that support the thesis are: "Students need courses that are relevant," and "Students can learn to save lives." Unreasonable arguments would be: "The Red Crescent wants you to take the course."

Equal in value

Are your reasons of equal value, or is one statement significantly more important than the other? Is one statement simply not as important a reason or consideration as the other?

Main points should be of equal importance if at all possible. For example, if the thesis statement is "Every one should go for a morning walk." Two important reasons might be: "Walking is a good exercise," and "Walking is good for health." The statement "Walking is a good exercise because I like it" is neither logical nor as important as the other reasons for walking.

Distinct

Are your main points distinct from each other, or do some main points restate or overlap other statements?

For instance, suppose your thesis is "Crimes against women is a serious issue in this country" Two distinct supporting statements might be: "Teenage gangs are terrorizing women," and "Women living in big cities are the victim." These points are distinct because the first emphasizes who is causing the assaults and the second emphasizes the place where the assaults occur.

Two main points that relate to the same thesis and are not distinct might be: "Women are the victim of terrorism in big cities" and "Women are seldom hurt in small cities." These are not distinct statements. They both say the same thing, but from different vantage points.

Central to the issue

Will the main point answer the central question for the audience? In persuading your audience to play cricket, you might use as main points that cricket will make you thinner, healthier, and happier. These reasons are central to the issue. However, if your reasons for advising a person to play cricket include that cricket is played in different countries and that Mr. X is an excellent cricket player, your main points are not central to the issue.

In summary, your main points should be statements that are clear, logical, equal in value, distinct, and central to the issue.

Lesson 15

Introduction

Before you reach this step you have decided upon your topic, designed your thesis, formulated your reasons, and collected your supporting material. The next few steps consist of putting your ideas in order. In preparing your speech, you have worked very hard gathering information. You know what the information means to you.

Now you need to create meaning for the audience. Putting your information in order will help to create meaning for the audience.

Every speech has these general parts. Usually it is organized by dividing it into these three areas:

1. Introduction
2. Body
3. Conclusion

Every speech, no matter how poorly constructed and poorly organized, has some kind of introduction (you have to begin), some middle section (the body), and some kind of conclusion (at some point in time you have to finish).

Introduction

An introduction is a beginning. It is a very important part of the speech process because it is during the introduction that the audience first sees you and learns about your topic.

At what point does an introduction begin? It begins the moment you address the audience. The moment you turn to look at the audience and utter your first sounds or communicate something nonverbally, you have: begun your introduction. In the introduction phase, the audience may decide if you are credible and if your speech will be worth their attention.

Your introduction should have four purposes:

1. Getting the audience's attention
2. Introducing your thesis
3. Adapting to the audience
4. Establishing your rapport or credibility with the audience

Getting the audience's attention

It is obvious that you must get the audience's attention before you can inform them or persuade them about your subject matter. There are many methods for getting people's attention. Before you decide on a method, you must consider the audience, their background, interests, attitudes, and the tone of your subject. The device you use to get the audience's attention must be appropriate for the audience and the subject, matter. If you are talking to an audience of intelligent, mature adults about the problems caused by inflation, you could get their attention by walking into the room and beginning to shout. The loud unexpected noise would certainly get their attention initially, but if the loud noise did not have anything to do with the subject, you would quickly lose their attention, and your credibility with that audience might suffer greatly.

There are several more desirable tools for getting the audience's attention:

- Startling statements
- Stories

- Rhetorical questions
- Quotations
- Style of delivery
- Humorous anecdotes
- Reference to the subject or occasion
- Personal reference

A startling statement is a strong statement designed to evoke a powerful emotional response. It gets attention by creating suspense, conflict, humor, or by the sheer intensity of the statement. Many stories, magazines, or advertisements use startling statements to get the audience's attention.

"Calories can kill" is a startling statement. It encourages you to ask how or why, "Every day you are being poisoned" is a strong statement designed to get your audience's attention. This statement might alarm you, so you will probably listen to reduce your fears or simply to find out what the statement means.

All of us like stories; we generally relate best to information that is real, exciting, or familiar to us. If you are talking about child abuse, a story of such an occurrence makes an effective beginning. The story makes the situation real; it brings us closer to the situation by making the information personal. The story makes us pay attention.

For example, if your thesis statement is "Child abuse is a serious problem in this country," you might begin your speech with the following story:

“A sick baby is crying. It is four o' clock in the morning. A young, tired woman gets out of bed for the third time tonight in a week, of sleepless nights. She picks up the child trying to comfort her, but the sick child begins to scream louder. The woman tries again to quiet and comfort the child but is unable to do so. Finally the woman begins to smack, then hit, and eventually to beat violently the sick child. Thirty minutes later the child is finally, permanently still.”

This defenseless child was one of many small children who were seriously harmed or murdered in the past year as a result of child abuse. Child abuse is a serious problem in this country.

The story, horrible as it is, does get your attention.
A third introductory technique is to ask your audience a rhetorical question. This encourages them to think about the subject and become involved with the speech. For instance, "How many of you know what the prime cause of divorce is?” You are not expecting an answer; you are really just asking them to think about it.

If, however, someone does decide to answer aloud, do not get angry or lose your composure: just incorporate the response, whether accurate or not, into your speech. Remember that the member of the audience who vocalizes his response is paying you, the speaker, a compliment by being interested enough in your message to respond.

A quotation is also an effective means of beginning a speech, providing it is effectively worded and appropriate for the subject matter. You should select a quotation whose source has a positive, or at least a neutral, effect on the audience. If the audience reacts negatively to the source of the quotation, the quotation itself may be discounted.

Your style of delivery may be an attention-getter in itself. The vocal tones, pauses, facial responses, and body positions that accompany your verbal message may be means of getting your audience's attention.

If you are going to talk about a very serious problem, you could begin your speech at a very slow pace, with a low solemn tone and a serious facial expression. These behaviors would suggest that the subject is important.

The style of delivery may set the tone and mood of the speech. It may get the attention of the audience, but it is helpful to couple this device with one of the other attention-getting devices.

Most of us like to laugh and have fun. We enjoy stories, jokes, and witty remarks. These humorous anecdotes are a delightful way of beginning a speech, introducing your thesis, and getting your audience's attention.

However, humorous anecdotes are effective only if they are in good taste and if they reflect the tone and mood of the entire speech. People who are unaccustomed to giving speeches sometimes call us for suggestions. They often request a joke with which to begin their speech; when asked what the subject matter is, they will say it is not important, "I just want a joke."

Someone somewhere said that a joke is always a good way of beginning a speech. It is a good way, but if and only if you are comfortable telling the joke, if the audience will probably appreciate it, and if it is appropriate to the subject. You wouldn't tell a joke to introduce a very serious or sad subject, it wouldn't be appropriate because it wouldn't be in keeping with the subject.

You can begin your speech by a reference to the subject or to the occasion itself. For example suppose you were going to talk about the new television programs for the fall. You might begin your speech by stating, "Tonight I would like to give you a glimpse of the exciting new television season for the fall."

All of us have heard a speaker refer to the occasion as an attention-getter. These are statements like "it's nice to be here in Lahore during Spring time," or "Tonight at graduation, I am proud to… " and so on.

You may also begin your speech with a personal reference that relates to the subject. For instance, at a recent graduation the speaker began the commencement address by stating that the speech was the first one she had given to such a large audience. She went on to say that, prior to taking a speech course, she would never have been able to give a commencement address. Her personal reference was an appropriate attention-getter because her topic was 'The value of continuing one's education."

Introducing your thesis

The second purpose of the introduction is to indicate to the audience what the subject of the speech is. The thesis sentence is typically stated in the introduction.

All the purposes of the introduction serve to reinforce each other but especially to reinforce the second purpose-to introduce the thesis.

Refer back to the story concerning child abuse. The story was designed to introduce the thesis, child abuse is a serious problem, as well as get the audience's attention.

Check your introduction. Does your introduction get the audience's attention? Does it also clearly introduce your thesis to the audience?

Adapting to the audience

Your attention-getting device should be clear and memorable, and your thesis should be a clearly designed, appropriately limited, declarative sentence. In order for both to be really effective, you must design them with your audience in mind.

When you construct your attention-getting step and design your thesis statement, make sure they are appropriate for the audience.

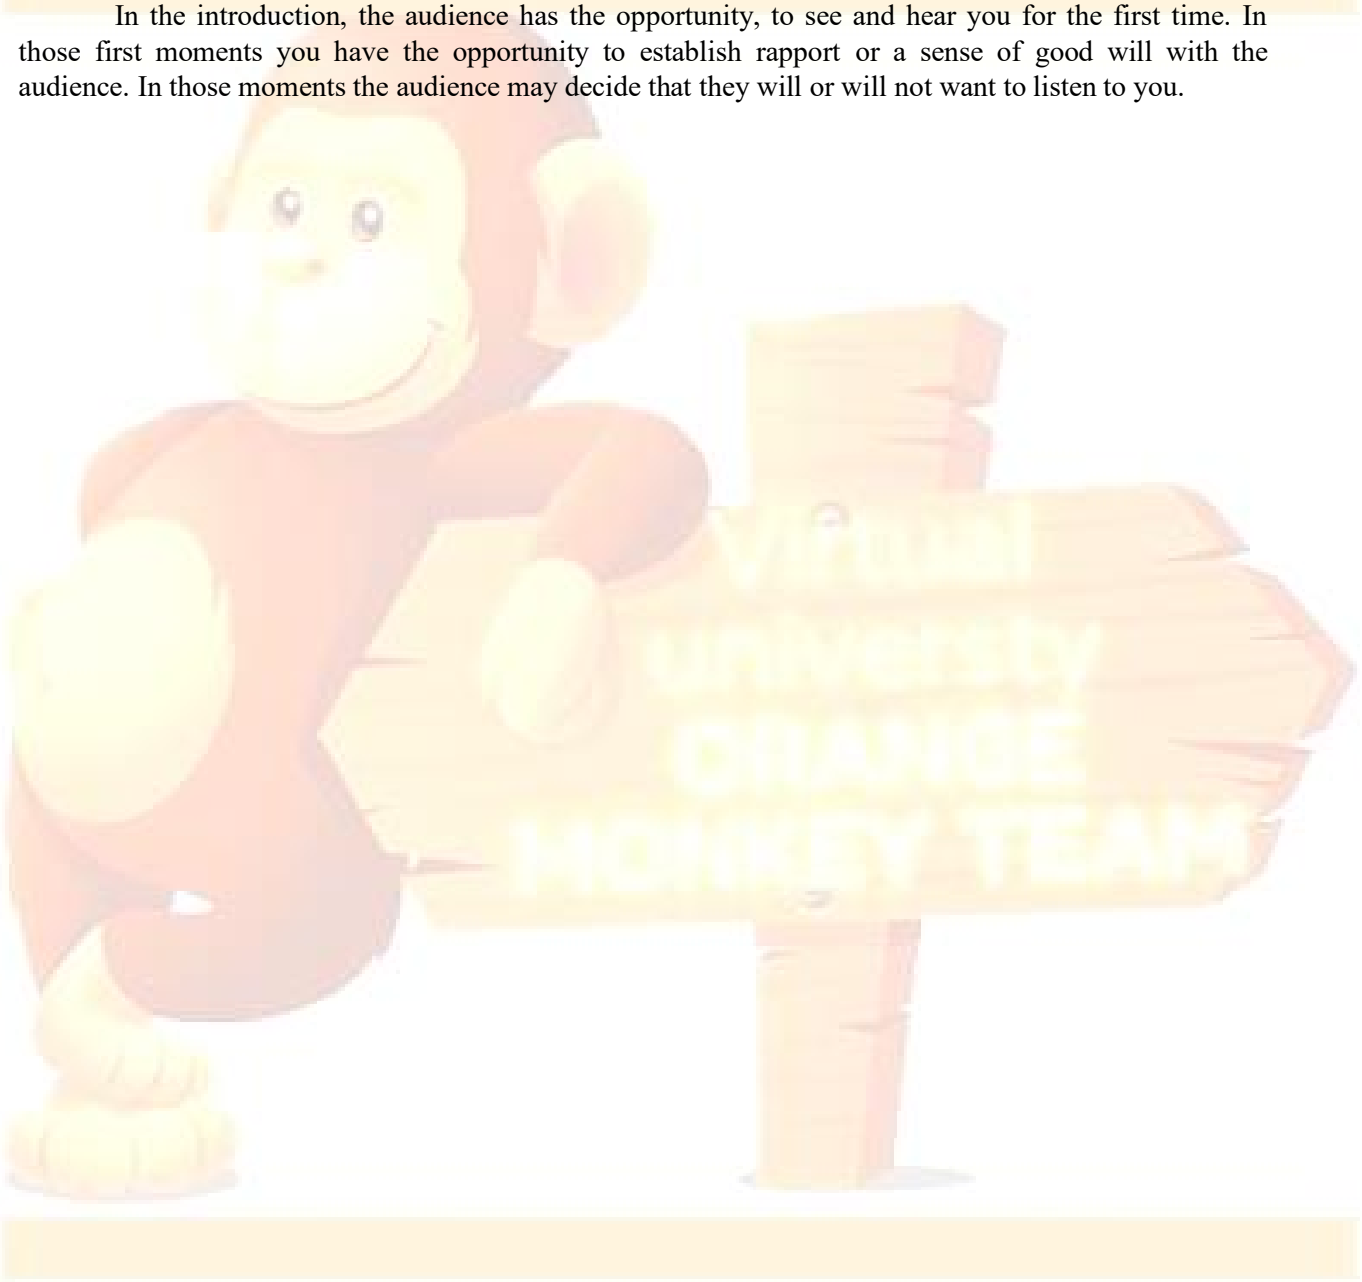

Ask yourself if your attention-getting device will get your audience's attention. Will they find it interesting, thought-provoking, witty, or memorable? Does it relate to or deal with the audience's interests, needs, or reasons for listening to the speech? If it does, then it will probably be of interest to the audience.

Now examine your thesis statement. Is it designed for your particular audience? Does the thesis involve them or relate to their needs or interests? Is it worded in such a way that it will hold the audience's interest? Reread your thesis statement. Now ask yourself if there is any reason why your audience might not want to listen to your thesis. If you can answer "No," then you have accomplished your purpose-you have adapted your introduction to the audience.

Establishing rapport with the audience

In the introduction, the audience has the opportunity, to see and hear you for the first time. In those first moments you have the opportunity to establish rapport or a sense of good will with the audience. In those moments the audience may decide that they will or will not want to listen to you.

Lesson 16

The body

Before you select a specific organizational pattern for the body of your speech, you can begin organizing your speech by outlining your information. Since you have by this point selected your topic, designed your thesis, and selected your main points, the necessary information for the body of your speech is complete.

Now construct an outline. An outline serves three purposes for a speech:

1. It helps put order to the information.
2. It serves as a model to check your work.
3. It serves as a guide from which to deliver your speech.

Next you need to select a specific organizational pattern. Some organizational patterns that will help create meaning for your audience are:

- Spatial
- Chronological
- Topical
- Logical

Topic:

Thesis:

Introduction:

Body:

I. .Main point # 1
  A. Supporting statement
    1. Supporting information
    2. Supporting information
  B. Supporting statement
    1. Supporting information
    2. Supporting information

II. Main point # 2
  A: Supporting statement
    1. Supporting information
    2. Supporting information
  B. Supporting statement
    1. Supporting information
    2. Supporting information

Conclusion:

Spatial order is the pattern of attaining material by taking into consideration the physical properties of your topic. For instance, if you are describing a building, you might describe it from the roof to the basement or from the basement to the roof; you are thus organizing the information by considering its physical properties.

If you are describing a movement, a trend, or a custom, you might arrange your material to describe the movement as it moved from east to west or from north to south. For example:

Topic: Accents
Thesis: Accents are different throughout the country.

Spatial order:

I. Accents in the East have certain characteristics.
II. Accents in the West have certain characteristics.
III. Accents in the North have certain characteristics.
IV. Accents in the South have certain characteristics.

Topic: Safe Deposit Schemes (SDS)
Thesis: SDS are offered throughout the country

I. 1st main point discusses the Peshawar branch
II. 2nd main point discusses the Islamabad branch
III. 3rd main point discusses the Lahore branch
IV. 4th main point discusses the Karachi branch

Chronological order

Chronological order is the method of arranging your subject's main points in a time sequence. Some information, such as a message about a historical movement or process, lends itself to chronological ordering, For example:

Topic: History of Lahore
Thesis: Our city has changed a lot in the last ten years

I. 10 years ago all the major roads were reconstructed
II. Five years ago they were connected to the motorway
III. Today it is considered to be one of the best cities of the country

Topic: Earth quake victims
Thesis: The Band-Aid Benefit Concert helped a lot towards their rehabilitation

I. 1st main point focuses on the creation of the event
II. 2nd main point focuses on the planning
III. 3rd main point focuses on the actual performance/concert
IV. 4th main point focuses on donation & assistance that resulted from the entire process

©Copyright Virtual University of Pakistan

Topical order

Topical order is a method of arranging information by dividing it into parts. Each part or division becomes a main point in the speech. For example:

Topic: Earth quake victims
Thesis: The Band-Aid Benefit Concert helped a lot towards the rehabilitation

I. 1st main point discusses Band-Aid administration
II. 2nd main point discusses performers
III. 3rd main point discusses sponsors
IV. 4th main point discusses audience

Logical order

There are several types of logical order:

- Problem/solution
- Cause/effect
- Deductive
- Inductive

The problem/solution method is an effective organization pattern to use if you want to persuade your audience that a problem exists for which you have a solution. The following steps are involved in problem/solution organization:

I. Define the problem.
II. Show the possible solutions.
III. Propose the best solution to the problem.

Let us briefly go through each step. We will use as an example the topic "Fad Diets" and the thesis "Fad diets can be dangerous to your health."

Step l: define the problem

In the first step, you should describe the current situation, indicating that it is a serious problem affecting many people. For instance, you could begin by describing the current emphasis on being thin as a means of preserving one's health and maintaining one's physical attractiveness. The need to be thin has encouraged people to try fad diets that promise quick and dramatic results.

You would next explain to the audience that these fad diets can create serious health prob1ems. You would support this assertion with facts, statistics, and examples.

Finally, you would describe how widespread the problem is. At this point you might have involved the audience already by asking them rhetorical questions about their own dieting habits.

Step 2: show the possible solutions

In the second step, discuss two or three possible solutions. You might explain that we have several alternatives to fad dieting that are healthier and safer. These include counting calories, counting carbohydrates, and increasing the amount of physical exercise we engage in.

Step 3: propose a solution to the problem

In the third and final step, propose your solution, indicating that it is the best solution and that it will not create other more serious problems.

The completed outline for our example, then, looks like this:

Topic: Fad Diets
Thesis: Fad diets can be dangerous to your health.

I. Fad dieting is a serious, widespread problem affecting people's health.
II. There are alternative solutions to the problem of being overweight.
III. People should seek professional medical advice in selecting the best way for them to lose weight.

A second logical arrangement is the cause/effect pattern or organization. With this pattern you can arrange your material by deve1oping the cause and then explaining the effects, or vice versa.

This pattern is especially effective if the audience already knows that the problem exists. For example:

Topic: Assertion
Thesis: People are taught to be non assertive.

Cause/effect pattern:
Cause { I: People are punished for assertive behaviors by superiors.
Cause {II: People often have role models who are nonassertive.

Effect {III: People learn to be passive.
Effect {IV: People learn to be aggressive.

A deductive ordering is the pattern of beginning with a general statement that is commonly accepted by the audience and then introducing more specific statements that will develop and lead to the main point of your speech, You reason from the general statement to the more specific statements to your conc1usion or resolution. For example, your general statement is: "Reading is an important skill for every college student to have." You begin with this general statement, then list specific instances of the importance or reading to the college student (with examples that illustrate the results of an inability to read well) because you wish to persuade your audience that "every college student needs to take a course in reading."

Inductive ordering is just the reverse of the deductive. In the inductive pattern, you begin with specific examples, facts, and supporting evidence, then move toward more general arguments, and, finally, conclude with your general statement or thesis. One reason for using the inductive approach is to allow the audience to think through the process with you. Or if the audience feels negatively about your general statement, you need 'to .begin with specific information that will be less threatening to them.

For instance, suppose the general statement or thesis is "Every child needs a dog." Maybe your audience is composed of parents who do not wish their children to have a dog for various reasons. You don't want to make the audience feel defensive. You might begin by stating that (1) my daughter has a pet; (2) many children in the neighborhood have pets; (3) Children are required to engage themselves by playing with them, taking care of them; (4) It is not only fun, but also builds confidence, responsibility in children; and finally (5) every child needs a pet.

In this instance, you started with a specific example, you progressed to a more general statement, and you concluded with the thesis. Hopefully, by the time you are ready to conclude, the audience will feel favorably toward your thesis. The inductive ordering begins with the specific and progresses toward the general; with deductive ordering, you would begin with the general statement "Every child needs a pet" and then develop the speech by stating specific reasons.

Conclusion

The final step in putting the speech together is to design a conclusion. A conclusion should focus attention on the thesis, leave the audience in an appropriate mood, and give the audience a sense of completion. A conclusion is not simply stopping when you are tired of talking. There are several methods that can be used to conclude a speech:

- Summary
- Quotation, story, or example
- Statement of personal intention
- Call to action

You might use one or a combination of them to conclude your speech.

Summary

You might conclude your speech by simply summarizing the information presented or restating your thesis. You have probably heard speakers who conclude their speeches with phrases that begin with "in summary," "to summarize my main point," or "to conclude, what I want you to remember is . . ."

There are many artful ways of summarizing your information. You do not simply stop. You put your speech in focus with a summary. By restating your thesis or summarizing the main points: the audience will leave with your main idea still fresh in their minds.

Quotation, story, or example

You might conclude your speech by illustrating your thesis with a quotation, story, or example. The audience will then leave the speech situation with a memorable example or illustration of your thesis.

Statement of personal intention

Another method of concluding is to state what you intend to do with regards to the subject, situation, or problem. For example, suppose your subject is child abuse. You might conclude your speech by stating what you intend to do about the problem.

Call to action

You might ask the audience to do something. You might ask them to demonstrate that they understand or agree with your thesis by doing something new. If your thesis was concerned with the danger of smoking, for example, you might ask them to give up smoking or you might ask them to campaign against it. The point is that you conclude by asking the audience to take action – to get involved, to participate, or to change a behavior.

Guidelines

- Conclusion should be worded strongly
- Conclusion should be phrased in a way that it shows your conviction
- Present a plan, proposal, or solution
- Ask the audience to do something tangible
- Your audience must be able to relate to your conclusion
- Your conclusion should be practical

Lesson17

Modes of Delivery

There are four modes of Speech Delivery

Reading from a manuscript

Reading from a manuscript is the most formal type of delivery. It is also an effective choice when you want to have the greatest control of the wording of your speech.

You will probably use a manuscript when speaking on a highly sensitive topic for which it is important to have precise wording. Or, if you have spent special effort embellishing your speech with stylistic elements, reading from the manuscript will ensure that you speak the phrases just as you wrote them.

Often, however, reading your speech will rob the presentation of spontaneity and the conversational dynamics that effective speakers strive to achieve.

To compensate for that, you will need to practice your reading to give it the feeling of being spoken for the first time. Skillful manuscript readers will also make spontaneous changes in their speech at the moment of delivery.

Reading from manuscript seriously limits your ability to:

1. exhibit a natural style,
2. maintain eye contact,
3. observe and evaluate feedback, and
4. adjust the messages.

Therefore, never use the written style just out of fear of facing an audience, of forgetting the material, or of encoding messages improperly. Overcome that fear through practice and experience.

If the formality or complexity of an occasion demands the use of the manuscript, observe these important procedures:

- Write a draft of the speech according to sound writing principles.
- Revise by reading the written speech aloud sentence by sentence and making adjustments necessary to convert a readable piece into a speak-able piece.
- Type the revised manuscript in double- or triple-spaced, wide-margined form on only one side of the paper, possibly all in capital letters.
- Practice reading aloud several times before a videotape camera, friends, or a mirror to improve delivery, eye contact, etc.
- Mark the points of some of your important pauses, phrases, emphases, and other nonverbal cues directly on the manuscript. Practice several more times.
- Apply all of the suggestions for good verbal and nonverbal presentations.

Presenting from memory

Unless you have had training and practice memorizing long passages of text, the memorized mode is the hardest to pull off. Freed from a manuscript or notes, you are likely to have the added anxiety of forgetting what you wanted to say.

A memorized speech can also sound "canned" and lacking in spontaneity. Some speakers, however, are extremely skillful at memorizing. Others, who have presented the same ideas a number of times, will memorize their lines whether they intended to or not. Each time they speak on that or a similar topic, they can draw from memory.

The memorized speech may lead to the poorest delivery of all. Speakers must concentrate so completely upon recalling memorized material that they do not make contact or observe, evaluate, and adjust to feedback. Additional flaws exist in the memorized approach, which are:

1. the difficulty of memorizing more than a few paragraphs,

2. the possibility of forgetting material during the speech, and
3. the difficulty to presenting a memorized speech in a no mechanical manner

Speaking extemporaneously

When you speak extemporaneously you are literally making up the words of your speech as you go. That does not mean that you do not do preparation. Rather, as you rehearse you work from an outline or speaker notes that remind you of the progression of ideas in your speech.

Because you are choosing the words at the spur of the moment, an extemporaneous speech is likely to be very dynamic and sound spontaneous and fresh.

Choose the extemporaneous style all of the others. It has the advantages pf preparation, naturalness, flexibility, spontaneity, and full interaction with the audience. To develop an extemporaneous speech:

- Develop the speech by first writing and revising an outline. Write only a few sentences – and perhaps the opening and the closing.
- Place the outline or key words and phrases, possibly all in capital letters, on only one side of note cards. Leave plenty of space around and between lines.
- Using the note cards only when necessary, practice speaking aloud several times before a videotape camera, friends, or a mirror to improve delivery, sentence construction, eye contact, etc.
- Avoid practicing to the point that you memorize a fixed pattern of words. Practice only you know that you will speak in a coherent but spontaneous manner.
- Apply all of the suggestions for good verbal and nonverbal presentations.

Impromptu speech

The impromptu speech occurs with little or no time for preparation. The reduced chances for analyzing the audience, organizing, and encoding require a fast-thinking speaker. When delivering an impromptu speech, use these suggestions:

- At even a hint that you may have to speak, begin to apply the guidelines, even while walking or turning to face the audience.
- Move the planning directly to the specific topic, objectives, and key points. Write them on paper if you have the seconds necessary to do so.
- When first facing the audience, take a few seconds to form the first words silently before speaking them.
- Watch for feedback to know when to repeat or clarify.
- Speak briefly, and conclude firmly.
- If appropriate, ask if the audience has questions.

Lesson 18

Strategies for Effective Oral Delivery

VOCAL CUES

A voice communicates a great deal more than words alone. A presenter's voice is a potentially powerful tool to make an oral delivery effective and impressive. Professionals whose careers depend on skilled communication take seriously the need to develop positive and powerful vocal attributes.

The quality of a speaker's voice is determined by four characteristics: pitch, volume, rate, and tone. An effective speaking voice is well modulated, meaning the pitch, volume, rate, and lone are altered to give appropriate and interesting expression to the message. A voice that is pleasing and easy to listen to is mellow, meaning it is rich in tone and sounds fully mature. It is moderate; the pitch is not too low or too high, volume is not too loud or too soft, and the rate of speech is neither too fast nor too slow.

To add to the effectiveness of a delivery, the qualities of a speaker's voice should be varied and congruent with the message. Vocal qualities should also be varied to provide contrast. In addition, since it is often perceived that the nature of a person's voice reflects something of the nature of the person, a presenter should develop and communicate with a steady, resonant, and mature voice.

Pitch

The term pitch refers to the degree of highness or lowness of a sound. Every voice has a normal pitch in terms of what is '"normal" for the speaker. The norm for an effective communicator is a pitch that can be raised a few levels without sounding squeaky and lowered a few levels without sounding grimly. Such a range allows a speaker to vary pitch for contrast while maintaining a vocal quality that is pleasing to the ear.

Pitch has a notable impact on how a presenter is perceived. In every species that makes audible sounds, the young have higher-pitched voices than do grown adults. Consequently, a high-pitched voice is associated with immaturity. An excessively high-pitched voice is shrill and unpleasant to listen to for long. A person who speaks in a high-pitched voice will be taken more seriously if the pitch is lowered.

An effective presenter uses pitch changes to indicate a change in the message. At the end of a sentence, dropping the pitch signifies a statement; raising the pitch signifies a question. For that reason, repeated lifts in pitch ac the end of declarative statements create an impression of a speaker who is uncertain. Occasional and appropriate variations in pitch can be used to accentuate meaning. Rapid, frequent, and meaningless changes in pitch make it difficult for an audience to listen attentively, and may suggest that the speaker is highly emotional or frantic.

Volume

Listeners want to clearly hear a speaker without straining to do so and without being blasted out of their chairs. A presenter who speaks too loudly may be perceived as bombastic, aggressive, or insensitive to listeners. On the other hand, one who speaks too softly may convey the impression of being passive or insecure.

It is commonly thought that. a point is emphasized by voicing it more loudly. The reverse is true. An audience is more attentive to a point that is stated at a lower (but still clearly audible) volume. Emphasis is added by lifting the pitch, slowing the rate, and/or changing the tone of voice. (Vocal emphasis is further strengthened with appropriate visual cues.)

Rate

An average rate of speech is 140 words per minute. As with other vocal characteristics, the rate of speech should be varied during a presentation. For emphasis, a speaker may periodically slow down to less than 100 words per minute to voice a point in a deliberate manner. To elevate the level of energy or quickly convey a point of lesser importance, a speaker may occasionally accelerate the rate to more than 170 words per minute.

A consistently slow rate of speech conveys fatigue or disinterest. Flailing speech can suggest that the speaker has difficulty formulating thoughts. Presenters who consistently speak at a rapid rate may be perceived to be nervous, impatient, or hurried.

Tone

The quality of tone is a combination of pitch, strength, and character. Character refers to the sense or meaning a particular tone conveys. For example, a tone of voice may be described as gentle, angry, sarcastic, childish, or serious. The tone of voice with which a speaker expresses a point says more to an audience than the words themselves. As with other vocal characteristics, tone also says something to an audience about the speaker. A faltering tone of voice is perceived as timid or indecisive, a harsh tone of voice as aggressive. A nasal lone lacks the depth that adds authority to a voice. A monotone or flat tone that lacks variations suggests a lack of interest or energy.

Speech Patterns

The term speech pattern refers to any vocal trait that is habitual. Although usually learned behavior, speech pattern are sometimes a reflection of a psychological or emotional condition. A person who repeatedly voices the phrase like “you know" may have acquired the habit from a peer group, or the pattern may signal that the person is nervous when speaking before a group.

Like the characteristics of vocal quality (pitch, volume, rate, and tone), speech patterns can either contribute to or detract from a presenter's effectiveness.

Some speech patterns are very pleasing and add to the clarity and meaning of a message, others are very distracting or muddle a message. The speech pattern with which presenters are most concerned arc inflection articulation, fillers, pauses, and accents.

Inflection.

Proper inflection is the practice of altering the tone and/or pitch of voice to more clearly express or magnify meaning. It is an effective communication technique that can help to sustain audience attention and make a message more memorable. Proper inflection is a speech pattern of skilled speakers who deliver each point in just the right pitch and tone that exactly conveys the conveys of the information, how the speaker feels about the point, or how the speaker wants the audience to feel in response.

Meaningless or misplaced inflection is a barrier to effective communication. For instance, a sing-song (roller-coaster) effect is produced by a repeated pattern of gradually raising pitch when voicing the first phrase of a compound sentence; peaking mid-sentence at the conjunction (and, or, but); then dropping the pitch as the second phrase is voiced. It is meaningless to repeatedly begin sentences with a booming volume, and then allow the volume to trail off at the end, with little or no inflection on selected words.

Articulation

Articulation is the skill of speaking in distinct syllables. Articulate speech is characterized by correct pronunciation and clear enunciation. More articulate speech is developed by listening to articulate speakers and emulating their speech patterns, checking a dictionary when in doubt about the pronunciation of a word, and practicing enunciation exercise. Enunciation exercise stress movement of the mouth; relaxation of the lips, tongue, and jaw muscles that are used to form words; and voicing consonants clearly and distinctly.

Mumbling is a speech pattern lacking articulation. Speakers who mumble do not convey vocal vitality, they lose the advantage that skillful inflection adds to a presentation, and they may be perceived as disinterested or timid. Articulation can, however, be overdone. Precise and obviously deliberate attention to every detail of' sound and syllable suggests the speaker is making too much of an effort to speak correctly, which may sound contrived to an audience.

Fillers

One of the more distracting patterns of speech is the use of fillers unnecessary words or phrases that are repeatedly interjected into a message. Expressions such as "uh," "um," "you know," "basically," and "it's kind a like" add no meaning. Fillers interrupt the continuity of communication. They signal uncertainty or nervousness on the part of a speaker who tries (often unconsciously) to fill up every silence with sound.

The speech pattern of voicing fillers can be overcome by practicing the techniques listed below.

Speak in shorter sentences. Avoid run-on sentences that string together several phrases joined by conjunctions. Speakers who make excessive use of conjunctions are more likely to develop a habit of attaching a filler to every conjunction, as in "and um" or "but uh."

Concentrate on bringing each sentence to an end (period).

Pause to breathe.

Prepare. Know the message so well that the material comes to mind quickly and easily. Frequently, fillers are an attempt to "fill in" a gap between one idea and the next. A well-prepared speaker is less likely to experience mental gaps.

Practice alternate words and phrases that can be used in place of fillers, such as "in addition," "on that point," and "however."

A speech pattern similar to the use of fillers is the repeated use of superlatives: exaggerated expressions such as "awfully," "enormously," "terrific," "amazing," and "awesome." Rather than adding meaning to a message, the frequent injection of superlatives can be distracting and may detract from the speaker's credibility.

Pauses

At one time, a soft drink was advertised with the slogan, “The pause that refreshes." Pauses in a presentation can have the same effect. While a presenter is speaking, the audience is working at listening. A moment of silence gives listeners an opportunity to digest what they have heard. Pauses help a speaker avoid the use of fillers. They can serve to slow a too-rapid rate of speech. Intentional pauses can add importance to a message. Inserted after a key point or after a particularly striking or insightful statement, a pause allows the audience a moment to reflect. "The right word," Mark Twain noted, "may be effective, but no word was ever as effective as a rightly timed pause."

Accented Speech

Every speaker has an accent. How pronounced an accent sounds depends upon how much the presenter's speech varies from that of the listener. Some accents are pleasing to listen to. They add a distinctive flavor to a presentation and enhance how the presenter is perceived. In other cases, accented speech is difficult for an audience to understand. Accented speech is problematic only if it inhibits a person from pursuing opportunities to present, or if it interferes with the clarity of communication. Usually, an audience indicates if a message is not clear by their feedback: quizzical facial expressions, gestures that signal uncertainty, or frequent questions that ask for clarification.

Since they are regional or ethnic in origin, accents suggest something of a speaker's background. As with other vocal characteristics and speech patterns, accented speech may influence how an audience perceives a presenter. Concern about the affect of an accent on the audience is alleviated by delivering a dynamic presentation that leaves people wanting to hear more. Presence, positive vocal qualities, and articulation offset the potential drawbacks of accented speech.

VISUAL CUES

People in an audience are viewers as well as listeners. They see a speaker before they hear the first words of a message. As with vocal cues, visual cues convey meaning, spark attention and response from the audience, and shape audience perceptions of the presenter. Skilled presenters are alert to what they communicate by facial expressions, eye contact, gestures, movement, and attire.

Facial Expressions

Standing before an audience, a presenter looks at the expressions on people's faces to ascertain audience reactions. Mentally, the presenter checks, "How does the audience feel about this point?" Likewise, an audience observes the presenter. From facial expressions, an audience derives a sense of how a presenter feels about a point and about them. Is the presenter smiling? Serious? Or wearing an expression of bland indifference? Is she grim or glad to be here? Does he appears confident or uncertain? Does the presenter appear relaxed and naturally expressive or tense and restrained? Some persons, nervous about speaking before a group, suppress their feelings in an attempt to exert self-control. The result is rigid and inhibited behavior that lacks expressiveness facially and in other respects as well. It is only by expressing how one feels about a subject that a presenter can hope to instill those same feelings in others. It does not suffice to express oneself in words alone. To have the greatest impact on audience, a presenter must express feelings visually. The excitement on a speaker's face generates excitement in an audience. An expression of concern prompts an audience to respond with concern. A facial expression that reveals anxiety causes an audience to feel anxious and uneasy.

With respect to facial expressions in particular, it is helpful to address a group as though speaking to a trusted friend one-on-one. Many people who mask their feelings when presenting are animated communicators when they "just talk" showing a range of facial expressions that would move an audience to applaud.

Eye Contact

Of all the features of the face, none has more potential for expression than a person's eyes. Making eye contact with people in an audience is important because it sends a signal that the speaker is connecting with them. Attention to eye contact forces a presenter to become sufficiently prepared so as not to be dependent on reading from notes. Meaningful eye contact distinguishes relational presenters from information-bound speakers.

To make and maintain eve contact entails more than merely looking at people. How a speaker looks at people in an audience is telling: the expression in and around a person's eyes is self-disclosing. A message and perceptions of the presenter are enhanced by meaningful and focused eye contact—meaningful in terms of being expressive, focused in terms of attentiveness to persons in the audience.

Depending on other visual cues conveyed, shifting one's eyes creates an impression of being either nervous or devious. Presenters want to avoid being perceived as "shifty-eyed," a term used to describe someone who is not straightforward. Rolling one's eyes can communicate uncertainty, frustration, or annoyance traits that are not appealing in a professional presenter. A presenter should also refrain from fixated eye contact; that is, unrelentingly fixing one's gaze on any one point or person in the room. A speaker who concentrates on notes, the top of a podium, or on visual aids neglects the audience. Fixing one's gaze on one person can make that person feel uncomfortable.

It is easier to make focused and meaningful eye contact with everyone in a meeting room when presenting to a small group. When presenting to a large audience, eye contact is made by "sweeping" the room with the eyes (similar to the way hands sweep the face of a clock). The technique is described below.

Picture that people in the audience are seated on the face of a clock. Periodically focus on different points of the "clock": to 12 (the back of the room), 3 (the side of the room to your right), 9 (the side of the room to your left), 6 (the front of the room nearest you). Move your glance to the center of the clock, and then sweep the room again. To avoid following a pattern that becomes predictable to the audience, alter the direction in which your eyes sweep the room. Although the sweeping technique does not ensure that a speaker will make eye contact with every person in a large audience, it does promote the perception that the speaker is doing so.

Presenters who refer to notes must develop skill at maintaining eye contact while handling notes. A technique practiced by newscasters is useful. Notes are placed unobtrusively at waist height. The speaker glances down to check facts (but doesn't drop the head too much), and quickly resumes eye contact with the audience. When changing from one sheet of notes to the next, the top sheet (or note card) is moved inconspicuously to the side and slipped under the bottom—without lifting, waving, or rattling pages in n distracting manner. Being very well prepared for a presentation minimizes the need to look at notes and frees a speaker to look at the audience with focused, meaningful eye contact.

Gestures

Natural, spontaneous gestures are an asset to a presentation provided they are consistent with the meaning a speaker intends to convey (and provided they are culturally correct). Appropriate gestures give physical expression to the spoken word. They are symbolic in nature, in that the meaning of many gestures is commonly understood among members of the same culture. What does it mean, for example, when a person responds to a question by shrugging the shoulders? In the United Stales, the gesture indicates, "I don't know." It could mean differently in a different country.

In a business presentation, speaker should refrain from gesturing in ways that trigger negative responses from an audience. Pointing or wagging the index finger, for example, is impolite and potentially offensive. Pointing is perceived as parental and is often associated with scolding. Instead of pointing, emphasis can be added by gesturing, with an open hand, fingers together, palm and inner wrist turned slightly toward the audience, forearm slightly bent and extended at about a 45-degree angle to the side (not aimed directly at the audience). A point can also be accentuated by slightly raising the forearm and cupping the hand with fingers touching (in a manner that suggests the point is perched on the fingertips). When gesturing, fingers should be together (splayed fingers make hands appear larger and gestures more aggressive). The palm should be relaxed (slightly curved, as opposed to a flat and rigid palm).

Hands should never be used to grip a podium. Doing so inhibits gesturing and conveys tension. A speaker should refrain from placing hands on hips with arms bent at the elbow a stance perceived as aggressive. In most situations, hands should be out of a speaker's pockets. Speakers who put their hands in their pockets often do so because they don't know what else lo do with them. From nervousness or lack of awareness, they jingle coins or rattle keys and distract the audience from the message. On occasion, when the setting is casual and a speaker wants to convey the impression of being "just one of the folks," placing hands in one's pockets (briefly) can be a gesture that puts an audience at ease. However, it is a gesture that should be done intentionally, sparingly, and only when appropriate to the setting.

Gestures are more natural when arms and hands are relaxed. When not gesturing, arms may drop loosely to one's sides, or hands may be comfortably folded (not tensely clutched) in front of the body in a manner that curves the arms forward. When a presenter uses gestures to accentuate a message, arms and hands will not stay in any one position for long.

Very expressive speakers need to lake care to avoid gesturing excessively. On the other hand, stoic speakers need to add gestures to their repertoire of presentation skills. When presenting to large groups, gestures need to be expressed more expansively or they will not be seen by people seated, at a distance from the platform.

Movement

The influence of television has accustomed people to viewing visual images in action. A presenter is a visual image. As a rule, when a speaker remains stationary, as though locked in one place on the platform, the interest of the audience wanes. When a speaker doesn't move. People in the audience don't move—their heads, their eyes, or their position while seated. Remaining sedentary for long is tiresome, and the last thing a presenter wants to create is the impression of being tiresome.

Head Movement

A speaker's head should move. How? In a manner that reinforces the meaning the speaker wants to convey. Nodding the head up and down communicates affirmation. Shaking the head side to side signifies disagreement. Cocking the head to the side signals uncertainty, or suggests that a person is thinking.

Body Movement

A speaker's body should move. Body movement adds more than expressiveness to a presentation. It adds energy as well. Effective presenters make use of the entire platform available to them as a means of expanding their presence before a group. From the perspective of the audience, a speaker who remains in one spot is present on that one spot only. Where as presenters who move around fill the meeting room with their presence. Movement suggests that a speaker is at ease comfortable, and confident in the presentation environment. Movement also enables a presenter to relate to an audience more effectively. By moving alternately to both right and left sides of the platform and forward toward the audience, a speaker can better make meaningful eye contact and convey connection with the audience.

The attentiveness and energy of both speaker and audience are heightened when a speaker stands. Standing, a speaker can move and gesture more freely than when seated. Standing, a speaker can breathe more fully then when seated. A person thinks faster when standing and more easily maintains a posture that appears alert.

Posture

On the matter of posture, the most becoming posture is upright (not rigidly erect), shoulders back and squared, head held up. A slouching or slumped posture suggests disinterest or low self-esteem. A presenter wants to appear at ease and, at the same time, attentive and on the ready. Good posture is an attribute that contributes to a speaker's presence.

Skilled movement avoids actions that are potentially distracting or irritating to an audience. Pacing repetitively back and forth, back and forth from one side of the platform to the other is distracting. So is rocking on the feet or swaying from side to side. Effective presenters refrain, whenever possible, from standing behind a podium.

A podium places a barrier between a presenter and people in the audience. If a podium is required, it is preferable to place it to one side of the platform, leaving the platform open for the presenter to be "out front" and "up front" with people in the audience. The speaker can move back toward the podium to refer to notes when necessary. Placing a podium at the center of a platform increases the temptation to stay behind it, which inhibits a presenter's gestures, movements, and relationship to the audience. In formal settings, the use of podiums persists. When a presenter must speak from behind a podium that restricts full-body movement, other vocal and visual cues take on even more significance than usual.

Attire

Few things about a presenter are as visible as attire. It is the first and most visible thing an audience sees and something they view throughout a presentation. The preferred attire, accessories, and grooming for a business presentation enhance audience perceptions of the presenter. They convey that the speaker is a credible, competent, first-class professional. Attire, accessories, and grooming should not distract from the presentation, of the message. A persuasive presenter wants people thinking and talking about what was said not about how the speaker looked or what the speaker wore. For these reasons, a presenter's attire should be clean, neat, and understated. The guidelines described below are consistent with the standards commonly accepted by successful professionals.

Refrain from overdressing or under dressing. In a business setting, a conservatively tailored suit of a dark color is preferable. For men a while shirt remains the standard. A white, cream, or pastel shirt is preferable for women. Loud colors or busy patterns should be avoided. Clothing should be clean and pressed. Shoes should be shined and in good repair.

Few accessories should be worn. Those that are should be relatively inconspicuous. Audience attention should be on the presentation, not distracted by large or flashy jewelry, such as glittery rings and watches or dangling necklaces and ear rings.

Hair should be clean and neatly styled. Hair that is too long, too fluffed, unkempt, or that falls across the face is distracting and detracts from a professional appearance. Fingernails should be clean, well manicured, and trimmed to a moderate length. Pale nail polish is preferred. Very long fingernails painted in bright or dark colors can distract an audience when a speaker gestures.

Clothing of very bold or bright colors should be avoided. Hot pink or neon green may be stylish and attractive to wear to a party, but will not create a favorable impression during a business presentation.

Appropriate attire for a business presentation is not based on personal preference or styles that are currently in vogue for social occasions. The purpose of a business presentation is not to make a fashion statement. It is to deliver a message that the audience will take seriously. They will be more inclined to do so if the presenter looks like someone to be taken seriously.

Avoid distracting habits

Some behaviors do not belong on the platform of a business presentation, among them those listed below.
Never chew gum in a business presentation.
Never smoke in a business presentation.
Refrain from fiddling with clothing, jewelry, hair, fingernails, audio-visual equipment, or in any manner that could distract the attention of the audience.

A professional's platform behavior is always governed by good manners and courteous regard for the people in an audience.

Lesson 19

Making a Good Speech

▪ Keep your audience in mind: Because your audience cannot "rehear" ideas, once you have stated them, look for ways to help your audience easily follow your ideas.

▪ Speak slowly, vigorously, and enthusiastically. Be sure you enunciate your words carefully, particularly if you are addressing a large group. Maintain a conversational style. Talk with the audience, not at them.

▪ Use gestures to accentuate points. Move your body deliberately to aid you in announcing major transition points. In short, avoid standing transfixed before your audience.

▪ Maintain eye contact with your audience. Doing so helps you keep your listeners involved in what you are saying. If you look at the ceiling, the floor, the corners of the room, your audience may sense a lack of self-confidence. Lack of eye contact also tends to lessen your credibility. In contrast, consistent eye contact enhances the importance of the message. By looking at your audience, you can often sense their reaction to what you are saying and make adjustments in your presentation if necessary. Be careful; do not lock eyes with individual members.

▪ Do not memorize your presentation, and do not write your presentation. Otherwise, your speech will sound as if you are reading it. Use brief notes, written on one page, if possible. Use colored pens to highlight points. Avoid note cards and several pages of notes. If you suddenly forget what you are trying to say, and if you have several pages of notes, you can easily lose track of where you are in your notes. If possible, type the outline of your presentation on one sheet of paper. If you do forget what you are going to say, a quick glance will usually refresh your memory.

▪ Rehearse your presentation until you are comfortable. Try walking around, speaking each segment and then speaking aloud the entire presentation. Rephrase ideas that are difficult for you to say--these will likely be hard for your audience to follow. Be sure to time your presentation so that it does not exceed the time limit. Keep your presentation as short as possible. Therefore, avoid adding information to your presentation (and your outline) as your rehearse.

▪ If possible, record your speech. Listen to what you have said as objectively as possible. As you listen, consider the main issues of audience, purpose, organization, context, content, and style. Listen for tone, attitude, and clarity. Is the tone you project appropriate for your audience and your purpose? Is each sentence easy to understand? Are you speaking too rapidly? Are the major divisions in your presentation easy to hear? Are any sentences difficult to understand?

▪ If possible, become familiar with the room where you will give the presentation so that you will have some sense about how loudly you should talk and how people will be seated. Also check out for size, temperature, cleanliness, and proper lighting.

▪ Try not to provide the audience handout material before you begin. To do so encourages your audience to read rather than listen. If you must provide written material, be sure the material is coordinated with your presentation. That way, you have a better chance of keeping your audience's attention on what you are saying.

No matter what type of presentation you are giving, your ultimate success as a speaker and the success of the presentation depends on your establishing credibility with your audience. Guidelines on planning, structuring, and delivering the presentations are important because they are designed to build your credibility with your audience. However, no amount of planning and organization will substitute for practice, which builds confidence. Practice also enhances and displays your planning and the value of your ideas.

Overcoming stage freight

Everyone experiences stage fright, speech anxiety, or fear of the audience. Surveys show that fear of speaking in front of people is one of the greatest fears people have.
The following lists some techniques people use for coping with this freight:

Know the room. Be familiar with where you will speak. Arrive early, walk around the speaking area and practice using the microphone and any visual aids.

Know the audience. Greet some of them as they arrive. It's easier to speak to a group of friends than to a group of strangers.
Know your material. If you're not familiar or are uncomfortable with it, your nervousness will increase. Practice your speech and revise it if necessary.
Relax. Ease tension by doing exercises.
Visualize yourself giving your speech. Imagine yourself speaking, your voice loud, clear, and assured. When you visualize yourself as successful, you will be successful.
Realize that people want you to succeed. Audiences want you to be interesting, stimulating, informative, and entertaining. They don't want you to fail.
Don't apologize. If you mention your nervousness or apologise for any problems you think you have with your speech, you may be calling the audience's attention to something they hadn't noticed.
Turn nervousness into positive energy. Harness your nervous energy and transform it into vitality and enthusiasm.
Gain experience. Experience builds confidence, which is the key to effective speaking.

Types of Speech

Informative Speech

Informative speaking offers you an opportunity to practice your researching, writing, organizing, and speaking skills. You will learn how to discover and present information clearly. If you take the time to thoroughly research and understand your topic, to create a clearly organized speech, and to practice an enthusiastic, dynamic style of delivery, you can be an effective "teacher" during your informative speech. Finally, you will get a chance to practice a type of speaking you will undoubtedly use later in your professional career.

The purpose of the informative speech is to provide interesting, useful, and unique information to your audience. By dedicating yourself to the goals of providing information and appealing to your audience, you can take a positive step toward succeeding in your efforts as an informative speaker.

Types of informative speeches: Objects, processes, events, concepts
These categories provide an effective method of organizing and evaluating informative speeches. Although they are not absolute, these categories provide a useful starting point for work on your speech.

In general, you will use four major types of informative speeches. While you can classify informative speeches many ways, the speech you deliver will fit into one of four major categories.

Informative speeches about objects
Speeches about objects focus on things existing in the world. Objects include, among other things, people, places, animals, or products.
Because you are speaking under time constraints, you cannot discuss any topic in its entirety. Instead, limit your speech to a focused discussion of some aspect of your topic.

Informative Speeches about Processes
Speeches about processes focus on patterns of action. One type of speech about processes, the demonstration speech, teaches people "how-to" perform a process. More frequently, however, you will use process speeches to explain a process in broader terms. This way, the audience is more likely to understand the importance or the context of the process.

Informative Speeches about Events
Speeches about events focus on things that happened, are happening, or will happen. When speaking about an event, remember to relate the topic to your audience. A speech chronicling history is informative, but you should adapt the information to your audience and provide them with some way to use the information. As always, limit your focus to those aspects of an event that can be adequately discussed within the time limitations of your assignment.

Informative Speeches about Concepts

Speeches about concepts focus on beliefs, ideas, and theories. While speeches about objects, processes, and events are fairly concrete, speeches about concepts are more abstract. Take care to be clear and understandable when creating and presenting a speech about a concept. When selecting a concept, remember you are crafting an informative speech. Often, speeches about concepts take on a persuasive tone. Focus your efforts toward providing unbiased information and refrain from making arguments. Because concepts can be vague and involved, limit your speech to aspects that can be readily explained and understood within the time limits.

Persuasive speech

Persuasive speech: A speech designed to change or reinforce the audience's beliefs or actions. The ability to speak persuasively will benefit you in every part of your life from personal relations to community activities to career aspirations. When you speak to persuade, you act as an advocate. Persuasion is a psychological process in a situation where two or more points of view exist. The points of view may be completely opposed, or they may simply be different in degree.

Persuasive speaking is complex & challenging. Audience analysis and adaptation is much more demanding than in informative speaking. You should enter a persuasive speaking situation with a realistic sense of what you can accomplish. If listeners are not strongly committed one way or another, you may be able to move some of them toward your side.

If listeners are strongly opposed to your viewpoint, you are successful if you cause a few listeners to reconsider their views.

A persuasive speaker must have a strategy to win the audience to his or her side.

Kinds of persuasive speeches

- Question of Fact - a question about the truth or falsity of an assertion.

Your goal in this speech is to persuade us to accept a particular view of the disputed facts. If the facts are not in dispute, there is no reason for you to try to persuade us. Your topic may address past, present, or future facts.

- Question of Value - a question about the worth, rightness, morality, and so forth of an idea or action.

Your goal in this speech is to persuade us to agree with your value judgments about an issue. These judgments deal with the relative worth of things; good or bad, right or wrong. You must justify your opinions by establishing standards by which we can measure the issue.

- Question of Policy - a question about whether a specific course of action should or should not be taken

Your goal in this speech is to persuade us what course of action should or should not be taken. Tell us what needs to be done. Again be very specific-Who should do what? Who is accountable? How can we participate in this change?

Organizing persuasive speeches

- Problem-Solution - first, show the existence of a problem, then present a solution
- Problem-Cause-Solution - identify the problem; analyze the causes of the problem; present a solution
- Comparative Advantages- each main point explains why a speaker's solution to a problem is preferable to other proposed solutions (used when the audience agrees a problems exists)
- Motivated Sequence- good for speeches that seek immediate action

Principles of persuasion

While preparing persuasive speeches, keep in mind that people are more likely to change their behavior if:

- the proposition asks for a small change rather than a large change in their lives (e.g., trying one vegetarian meal rather than becoming total vegetarians).

- the change will benefit them more than it will cost them. Consider the costs to the audience in terms of money, time commitment, energy, and skill.
- the change meets their needs. Needs vary in different communities, in different schools, and in different individuals.
- suggested change is approached gradually in the talk. Move from arguments which the audience will find most acceptable to those which the audience will find more difficult to accept.

Ceremonial Speeches

Such speeches are: tributes, acceptance, inspiration, after-dinner, & master of ceremonies.

Lesson 20

Handling Questions & Answers

Business presentations commonly include verbal feedbacks from the audience. This refers to questions, comments, or objections that are voiced by persons in the audience. A presenter can prepare effective responses by following the four steps as below:

1. Anticipating
2. Answering
3. Revising
4. Rehearsing

1. Anticipating

Questions and comments that an audience is likely to raise can be anticipated by considering:

- Previous experience
- Common concerns
- Planning
- Input from associates

Previous Experience

If a presenter has delivered the same or a similar subject previously, it is helpful to recall the questions or objections that were raised before. If the content of the message is essentially the same, it is probable that some questions and comments will be essentially the same from one presentation to the next. For instance: A consultant who makes oral presentations to prospective clients is regularly asked, "How do you propose we implement this program?"

Common Concerns

A presenter should expect questions or objections on issues that commonly interest or concern people. In broad terms, such issues pertain to time, cost, and impact. For example: people are likely to ask questions similar to those shown here:

- How much time will it take to develop, learn, implement, or gain a return?
- How much does it cost: short-term, long-term, per user, or compared to competitors?
- What is the impact if we do not act on the matter? What is the impact if we do?

Planning

Planning for a presentation can reveal questions and concerns that may be raised. These questions guide the planning process and help a presenter gain insight into the audience. By asking questions, a presenter can identify questions an audience may ask.

While planning and preparing, for a presentation for a prospective client the consultant reflects on the following questions. Who among this group is likely to raise questions? Or objections? What points in this presentation are subject to questions? What issues will this client be most interested in or concerned about? Are there any gaps or oversights in the message that the client will question?"

Input from Associates

Business associates can be a helpful source for identifying probable questions and objections. Associates who have more experience then the presenter in certain areas (the subject, the audience or a role the speaker has recently acquired) can serve as "advisors," alerting the presenter to the type of audience feedback to expect. If the presenter is as experienced as associates, it is still beneficial to solicit input from others who are likely to be more objective. An effective means of doing so is to deliver the presentation to associates who role-play members of the prospective audience and make note of questions or concerns that occur to them.

2. Answering

Write out answers to anticipated questions and objections. Anticipating audience feedback does not fully prepare a presenter to respond skillfully. A presenter must determine how each question or comment will be answered. Some speakers invest considerable time and effort preparing the content and audiovisuals for a presentation. They practice their platform behavior to deliver the message effectively. Then, when a member of the audience raises a question at the end, they hem and haw and stutter and slammer in response and sacrifice their credibility.

While preparing for a presentation, every anticipated question and objection should be written out. For each one, an answer is also written out. The best answers (like the best presentation content) will relate to the nature and needs of the audience, and will echo the core concept or a key point of the message. It is useful to prepare two options: summary answer and an expanded explanation. In most cases, it is preferable to answer in a summary manner (especially when time is limited). However, if summary answer does not satisfy the person who raised the issue, the presenter is prepared with a more detailed "back-up" answer.

3. Revising

Revise the content of the presentation. After anticipating questions and preparing answers to them, a presenter may find it advantageous to revise the content of the message. Doing so is recommended when a presentation is delivered repeatedly and, on almost every occasion, the same (or similar) questions and comments are raised. By rephrasing in existing point or inserting an additional point, the presenter addresses the issue before the floor is opened to questions.

Anticipated questions or concerns may be incorporated into the content by the use of rhetorical questions. The following questions are based on the earlier example that referred on a consultant's presentation. In this example, the presenter takes the initiative and beats the audience to the punch, so to speak, by integrating the issues into the message.

"How, you might ask, would you implement this program? That's the next point we'll consider."

"What impact can you expect? Understandably, many of our clients have asked that same question. They found..."

When anticipated questions or objections are addressed as part of the content of a message, the presenter is relieved of the pressure of having to formulate an answer on the spot. Moreover, people in the audience may perceive that the presenter is clever to have anticipated what is on their minds. They are favorably impressed when a presentation obviously is well prepared and relates specifically to their concerns.

It is not advisable to revise content to incorporate anticipated questions if one or more of these conditions exist:

- If doing so would interfere with the continuity of the message
- If the time available for the presentation is limited
- If the issue is potentially controversial and may not occur to an audience unless the presenter brings it up

5. Rehearsing

Rehearse a Q & A session.

Q & A is an abbreviation for the question-and-answer period that accompanies many presentations. Unless a presenter is proficient in fielding questions, and the presentation is one that has been done before, the presenter should rehearse a Q&A. Although the attention of an audience may vacillate during a presentation; all eyes and ears are on the presenter as soon as someone raises a question or objection. Vocal and visual cues are especially telling when a speaker is "on the spot" responding to audience feedback. It is essential to maintain a confidence presence, which is developed by practice.

In a simulated Q & A session, associates play the role of members of the audience to whom the presentation will be given. The presenter responds to questions and objections posed by associates. Rehearsing in this manner helps to develop self-assurance. In addition, it brings to light any answers that are vague, ambivalent, or that could be better worded to make a stronger case.

Inviting Questions & Comments

Types of verbal feedback to anticipate. Recognizing that thinking and communication patterns differ, a presenter should be prepared for verbal feedback that ranges from conceptual to concrete. Visionary people (those who look at the "big picture") typically ask questions that are broad in scope, such as "What are the implications? Or "What are your 10-year projections?" Detail-oriented people will focus on specifics and ask questions like, "How would this apply to assembly-line workers?" Or "How do your projections break down on a monthly basis per workstation?" Presenters who are inclined to be conceptual thinkers sometimes overlook preparing for detailed questions from others. Conversely, those who tend to think in concrete terms may neglect to anticipate questions of a broader nature. Both types concrete and conceptual should be considered.

Inviting audience feedback before a presentation

When it serves the purpose of a presentation to encourage audience involvement at the outset, a speaker can elicit questions or comments before delivering the body of the message. Audience feedback can, in fact, serve as the opener to a presentation. One sure way to capture people's attention is to get them talking. If the presenter has not yet delivered the message, what feedback can the audience members offer? They can voice feedback from their experience or ideas. The following example illustrates how the technique works. It is beneficial to make use of a flip chart or blank overhead transparencies to write keywords of the points people raise.

In a presentation to civic leaders, an urban development specialist opened his presentation by inviting comments from the audience. "I know you're all eager to hear our proposal for redevelopment of the downtown area. Before I relate what we have in mind, I'd like to take a few minutes to hear what is on your minds." (Knowing that people are sometimes reluctant to speak, up, the presenter volunteered the first comment to encourage feedback from the group.) "For example, if I were seated where you are, I'd want to know about the cost of the project. Is cost an issue some of you want to hear about?" (Of course it was and the audience nodded their heads in agreement.) "What else….?"

One person posed the question. "Will your plan stimulate business in the area?" (On a flip chart, the presenter wrote 'New Business.") Another member of the audience offered. "I'd like to see a plan that will add beauty to the downtown area." (The presenter wrote "aesthetics.") In minutes, half a dozen items were listed. Resuming his speaking role, the presenter went on to say. “Thank you these are all good point. And, as you'll soon discover, they are the very points that our plan addresses."

Questions and comments during a presentation

To invite questions or comments during a presentation requires a sufficient time frame, a setting in which participation is an acceptable norm, and a presenter who can maintain control of the situation. These conditions occur primarily in the Interactive mode. Typically, a presenter would not invite questions from the audience during a 15-minute speech at a service club luncheon. It might be appropriate and useful to do so during a one-hour sales demonstration. It is highly recommended to actively engage the audience during a full-day seminar or a three-day training session.

© Copyright Virtual University of Pakistan

There are drawbacks to inviting verbal feedback during a presentation. It can interrupt the orderly progression of the message and consume valuable time. It can disrupt a speaker's agenda, especially if an aggressive person tries to monopolize the Q &: A session. Nevertheless, including the audience adds a high degree of relational value to a presentation.

When done during a presentation, the best time to ask for questions or comments is after each key point. In that way, the presenter and the audience are less likely to lose the "train of thought" Before resuming the presentation, the speaker would make a transition statement: a brief summary (of the previous point) and preview (of the next point) that helps to bring the audience back on track with the subject

One potential drawback to taking comments during the course of a presentation is the risk of losing control of people in the audience or of the time allotted for the program.

When a speaker opens the floor to audience feedback during a presentation, it sometimes happens that a debate occurs between two or three people in the group. It is the speaker's responsibility to exercise command of the situation and assertively bring any debate to an end. A speaker can intervene with a statement like, "I appreciate your obvious enthusiasm for this subject. You have both offered some valid points. Since the next point will shed additional light on the issue, let's consider that now."

Q & A at the end of a presentation

In more structured setting, with larger audiences, or with a limited time trame, it is customary to defer audience comments and questions until the end of a presentation. A presenter should let the audience know at the outset if there will be a Q &A session at the end. After the introductory opener and preview, the speaker would add. "At the end of the program, I will be happy to answer any questions you may have." If a Q & A session is promised, it is imperative to finish the presentation early enough to allow sufficient lime for questions. Many speakers signal that they will take comments from the audience by asking, "Do you have any questions?" It is a closed question, which often elicits no response. This open question conveys that the speaker presumes people will have questions, and suggests that the speaker is receptive to hearing them.
After inviting questions from the audience, a presenter should pause at least 30 seconds. Presenters who immediately start talking after asking, "What questions do you have?" signal that they are not really interested in hearing from the audience. If no one in the audience responds, the presenter should voice a question to encourage the audience to speak up, saying something like, "One question I'm often asked is..." (And then volunteer a question that can be answered in a simple sentence or two).

A Q & A period should never end a presentation. The final question or comment from the audience could be such that it would end the presentation on a sour note. In addition, it is more awkward for a presenter to bring a program to a close when it ends with audience feedback. It is preferable to insert a Q & A period after the last key point but before the speaker's summary and close, sandwiched in toward (but not at) the end of a presentation. In this way, audience attention can be refocused on the speaker and the subject, and the speaker can control the manner in which the presentation ends. It is effective to end with an inspiring, amusing, or compelling anecdote or verbal illustrations the core concept of the message and brings the presentation to a powerful close.
