to reach an eventual goal of independence, parents and others encourage and ensure the child's skill development. Providing enough help at the task, yet not so much that the child will not be challenged, has been shown to be important (e.g., Ross, 1976). Thus children learn through their social interactions with others, who provide guidance or scaffolding in various culturally relevant ways. Older siblings scaffold children's play, guiding them to learn more about the world (e.g., using money to buy goods). The importance of children's environments and their interactions with family and other caregivers, with teachers and peers in whatever groups apply to the child's cultural context. Whether or not the availability of opportunities to play with other children affects the child's development.

Bronfenbrenner (1979) asserted the importance of the interactions between home and school). He called this the "mesosystem." Suppose in the classroom was the most important activity for young children's case there would be a significant imbalance in the goals for that child's school. Economic factors play an important role in this example, since parents with more money encourage academic pursuits over free play, whereas parents with less money encourage free play (Garborino, 1989).

In addition to the "mesosystem," there is the "exosystem," or any setting which affects the child but in which he or she is not directly involved. For example, policies in the parents' workplace, or municipal plans, may have an impact on the child's life even though he or she is not directly in contact with these systems. Schools, playgrounds, giving the children space and equipment with which to play, and more "family-friendly" work policies, changing the parents' schedule from home. In both cases, decisions will have an impact on the child's life even though he or she is not directly involved in these systems.

The broadest level of influence, comprising the cultural values and social norms, is the "macrosystem." In agrarian societies, for example, where children may be expected to help with farm work, each society may have definitive views about whether children should be part of it, and whether or not they should have to work or be part of it, and whether or not they should have to work or be part of it (Garborino, 1989).

In agrarian societies, for example, where children may be expected to help with farm work, each society may have definitive views about whether children should be part of it, and whether or not they should have to work or be part of it, and whether or not they should have to work or be part of it (Garborino, 1989). By contrast, cultures where the parents work outside the home and the child is more likely to provide support (direct or indirect) in the home life may be more likely to provide support (direct or indirect) in the home life. The model provides an important framework for considering the role of play in various social systems, with the family occupying the central role.

Play in the Home

Play is often seen as a time of leisure, but it is also a time of learning. In the home, play is often seen as a time of leisure, but it is also a time of learning. The young girl plays and also watches her mother work. For now, the partners of their parents, or as little adults being responsible for what they are doing and having to decide them, they are conceived of as having certain rights for which they get institutionalized support. Early in life they require the need to be strong-willed and self-determined, as is the case in many "post-modern" Western cultures (Kuczynski, in press).

Another example is adolescence which in some cultures simply does not occur because of the obligation to take over adult roles right after physical maturation. The end of childhood and beginning of adolescence is characterized in some cultures by extended (gender specific) rituals, separation of male adolescents from the family and integration in the male peer group headed by an adult male leader. In other cultures, due to the increasing role of education, adolescence is a separate and sometimes difficult developmental stage which is rather extended relative to other developmental stages. Here, adolescence is characterized by a more or less prolonged "moratorium" which should allow the adolescents develop a sense of identity in order to be able to fulfill adult roles later on. Some studies support the view that this period is characterized as "storm and stress" and emotional insecurity, contradicting other studies which did not find empirical support for the notion of adolescence as a period of crisis. A dominant view has been that adolescence is characterized by striving for autonomy and independence from parents and by achieving developmental growth through relatedness with peers. However, cross-cultural studies show culture-specific relations between parents and their adolescent children related to the adolescents' preference for independence and autonomy.

Adulthood is usually characterized by establishing a family, taking responsibilities as parents, and as active members of the society (e. g., in economic production; in political institutions). However, cultures differ with respect to conceptualizing adulthood and related developmental tasks of adults. Also, social changes are affecting the gender role, and thereby the family system, including the conditions for child care and parent-child relations.

The concept of old age is related to different age groups in different cultures, presumably depending on the "normal" life expectancy in a specific culture. In many industrialized societies development over the life span is extended into very old age. This is brought about by technological and social changes which give rise to increasing longevity as well as related changes in the roles of women and men, family systems, and
