In the beginning, New Coke (a product designed specifically to match the taste of Pepsi Cola) did well, however, the public rebelled and wanted their old Coke back. The company brought back "old" Coke (now called Coke Classic), sold both brands side-by-side, and eventually realized that consumers really preferred the older version of Coke. New Coke never lived up to expectations. Why? Looking back, we can see that Coke defined their marketing research problem too narrowly. The research looked only at taste; it did not explore consumers' feelings about dropping the old Coke and replacing it with a new version. It took no account of the intangibles—Coke's name, history, packaging, and image. Coke's managers may have used poor judgment in interpreting the research and planning strategies around it. The managers failed to remember that marketing research is not an exact science.

Difficulty: (2) Page: 153-155

98. Considering the information presented in this chapter, explain the importance of information to a firm in today's competitive environment.

Answer:
Marketing managers need timely, reliable, and relevant information in order to make decisions that will enhance the company's ability to compete successfully in the marketplace and increase customer value relative to the competition. Information is important but must be balanced between the manager's needs and what is feasible to offer. Too much information can overwhelm the manager just as too little information can lead to poor decisions. Cost versus value of information must always be considered.

Difficulty: (1) Page: 155, 156

99. Define the marketing information system and discuss its various parts.

Answer:
A marketing information system (MIS) consists of people, equipment, and procedures to gather, sort, analyze, and distribute needed, timely, and accurate information to marketing decision makers. The marketing information system begins and ends with marketing managers. First, it interacts with these managers to assess information needs. Next, it develops needed information from internal company data, marketing intelligence activities, marketing research, and information analysis. Finally, the MIS distributes information to managers in the right form at the right time to help them make better marketing decisions.

Difficulty: (2) Page: 156, Figure 5-1

100. Explain the differences between marketing intelligence, marketing research, and internal data (internal databases/and or records).

Answer:
All of these are methods that a firm can use to acquire information to stimulate and operate its MIS. Internal databases (and the records within them) are computerized collections of information obtained from data sources within the company. These databases can come from many sources (such as the accounting department and its financial records, manufacturing reports on production, marketing department reports on customers and sales, and the research department's special projects). Marketing research is the systematic design, collection, analysis, and reporting of data relevant to a specific marketing situation facing an organization. Marketing researchers engage in a wide variety of activities, ranging from market potential and market share studies, to assessments of customer satisfaction and purchase behavior, to studies of pricing, product, distribution, and promotion activities. Finally, marketing intelligence is the systematic collection and analysis of publicly available information about competitors and developments in the marketing environment. A company then uses this everyday information about developments in the marketing environment to help managers prepare and adjust marketing plans. The marketing intelligence system determines what intelligence is needed, collects it by searching the environment, and delivers it to marketing managers.

101. Describe an internal database and discuss the advantages and disadvantages of this form of marketing information.

Answer:
An internal database is an electronic collection of information obtained from data sources within the company. Marketing managers can readily access and work with information in the database to identify marketing opportunities and problems, plan programs, and evaluate performance. Information in the database can come from many sources, such as accounting, manufacturing, the marketing department itself, and research studies. Internal databases usually can be accessed more quickly and cheaply than other information sources, but they also present some problems. Because internal information was collected for other purposes, it may be incomplete or in the wrong form for making marketing decisions. Data ages quickly, therefore, keeping a database current requires a major effort. Most companies produce a mountain of data. Processing alone can be very difficult. Lastly, the database information must be well integrated and readily accessible through user-friendly interfaces so that managers can find it easily and use it effectively.

Difficulty: (2) Page: 157, 158

102. Identify and describe the four steps in the marketing research process.

Answer:
Step one is to define the problem and research objectives. Defining the problem and research objectives is often the hardest step. Three types of objectives might be present: exploratory research, survey research, or causal research. Step two is to develop the research plan for collecting information. In this step, the manager determines what information is needed, develops a plan for gathering it efficiently, and presents the plan to marketing management. In addition, the manager must consider specific information needs and how to collect information. Step three is to implement the research plan, and collect and analyze the data. Samples and survey techniques should have been considered by this point. Lastly, results are interpreted and findings are reported. The conclusion of a research process should be to specify action that would remedy the original problem or the reason for the research being initiated.

103. Describe exploratory, descriptive, and causal research. Point out the differences between the three forms of research.

a). Exploratory research—marketing research to gather preliminary information that will help define problems and suggest hypotheses.
b). Descriptive research—marketing research to better describe marketing problems, situations, or markets, such as the market potential for a product or the demographics and attitudes of consumers.

c). Causal research—marketing research to test hypotheses about cause-and-effect relationships.

104. Discuss what an online database is, give an example, and discuss how these databases may be of aid to a marketing manager.

Answer:
An online database is a computerized collection of information available from online commercial sources or via the Internet. An example would be CompuServe, Dialog, or LEXIS-NEXIS. This form of secondary research is often less expensive than primary research and, as long as the researcher understands the limitations of secondary research and the search process for it, can be very useful to the marketing decision maker and planner. The researcher must be assured that the research is accurate, relevant, current, and impartial.

Difficulty: (1) Page: 161-163, Table 5-1

105. Compare the advantages and disadvantages of the various methods for collecting survey information.

Answer:
Briefly summarized (for more detail see Table 5-3):
Mail questionnaires—collect large amounts of information, low cost, more honest, and usually have less or no interviewer bias. There is poor flexibility and data collection is slow.
Telephone surveys—best for quick collection, flexible, have sample control, and high response rates as long as the caller continues to call. Difficulties can occur in the quantity of data that can be collected, control of the interviewer effects, and cost.
Personal interviewing—in the individual or group format this form of research can be flexible and has an expanded quantity of data that can be collected. However, it is poor in its control of the interviewer effect and only fair in its control of the sample.
Online surveys—this method is excellent in cost control and speed of data collection. However, it has poor control of the sample and is only fair in the control of interviewer effects.

Difficulty: (3) Page: 167, Table 5-3

106. Discuss the focus group interviewing technique.

Answer:
Group (focus group) interviewing is personal interviewing that involves inviting six to ten people to gather for a few hours with a trained interviewer to talk about a product, service, or organization. The interviewer "focuses" the group discussion on important issues of concern to the marketer. Participants are normally paid a small sum for attending. The moderator encourages free and easy discussion, hoping that group interactions will bring out actual feelings and thoughts. The comments can be recorded in writing or on videotape for later study. Problems with the method include that the group is small, time is short, and it may be hard to generalize from the results. Because interviewers have more freedom in personal interviews, the problem of interviewer bias is greater.

Difficulty: (2) Page: 168

107. Discuss customer relationship management within the context of information acquisition and marketing research.

Answer:
Customer relationship management is defined as special software and analysis techniques for integrating and applying the individual customer data contained in databases. The overall purpose of this sophisticated software is to integrate customer information for all sources, analyze it in depth, and apply the results to build stronger customer relationships. Smart companies capture information at every possible customer touch point and use this information to bring the company and the customer closer together. Data warehouses and data mining would be applied to the customer relationship management process in its more developed and elaborate application.
