Correct

American sign

Ancient Maya. Nonlinguistic means of communication may accompany ordinary speech.

Difference in Nonverbal Communication and Sign language

American Sign Language is nonverbal in the sense that it is gesturally produced. But it is certainly verbal as it uses words. So, words are lexemes of spoken languages, while signs are lexemes of signed languages. By definition a gesture is a body or limb movement that you use to express a thought or feeling (Websters, 2001). The question arises why is it important to study nonlinguistic communication? The simple answer is that it can reduce frustration. It may improve relationships. Conflicts between linguistic and non-linguistic communication can lead to the consequence where discourse will be skewed.

Topic – 123: Extended Concept of Diglossia

Joshua Fishman presented a modification of Ferguson's (1959) original concept and rather strict definition of diglossia in (1967). He proposed an expansion of Ferguson's definition of diglossia in two respects.

1. A diglossic speech community is not characterized by the use of two language varieties only. There may be more than two language varieties used within a diglossic community.
2. Diglossia refers to all kinds of language varieties which show functional distribution in a speech community. Diglossia, as a consequence, describes a number of sociolinguistic situations, from stylistic differences within one language or the use of separate dialects to separate languages.

Topic – 124: Examples of Diglossia

The high variety may be an older stage of the same language as in medieval Europe, where Latin remained in formal use even as colloquial speech diverged. The high variety may be an unrelated language, or a distinct yet closely related present day dialect.

Language change is also called language_____.

Select the correct option

- ○ medium

language change

Turkish population use Turkish language in every aspect of their daily life. However, some people living in the south-east of Turkey use Kurdish or Arabic to communicate within their community. Since languages do not take place in vacuum, they are in constant contact and relation and are never stable, and are affected by each other. Thus, some influences occur, and some become stronger while some diminish or even die due to various sociological reasons (Baugh, 2011).

Majority population language puts pressures and affects the minority languages. Thus, change is mostly downwards (Milroy, 2004). For example: English pressures Pennsylvania German of the Amish society. Language change, also called "language shift", refers to a downwards movement. By the same token, Baker (2011) points out: "there is a reduction in the number of speakers of a language, a decreasing saturation of language speakers in the population, a loss in language proficiency, or a decreasing use of that language in different domains.

phonology; but slangs is the set that includes only a relatively small set of vocabulary items.

Topic – 117: What Are Clichés?

A cliché is a phrase or opinion that is overused and betrays a lack of original thought. We may understand it through the examples of usage such as "That old cliché 'a woman's place is in the home'". Clichés are terms or phrases that, upon their inception, were striking and thought-provoking. However, people began overusing them, making them seem trite. A cliché is an expression which is overused to the extent that it loses its original meaning or novelty. It may also refer to actions and events that are predictable because of some previous events. All examples of cliché were once new and fresh, they won popularity in the public and hence were used extensively to the extent that they now sound boring and have lost their original color. For instance, the phrase "as red as a rose"

We also need to understand what are not clichés. So, constant reuse of expressions does not necessarily create a cliché. Typical expressions that are used almost at all times in formal ceremonies, festivals, courts, etc. are not considered cliché examples; rather they befit such occasions, and are regarded as more appropriate. Here are some examples of expressions that are not clichés:

- "I second the motion" (Board or council meeting) social context these concepts gained huge significance in sociolinguistics.

Topic – 110: Sociolinguistic Competence and Language Choice

Chomsky defined competence as the grammar one knows without being necessarily aware of it linguistic knowledge; whereas performance as the way people use that linguistic knowledge when communicating (Coupland, et al 1997). Sociolinguistic competence is the knowledge of a language grammar as well as the factors behind it (connotation, levels of formality, style, and register, among others). Sociolinguistic performance, on the other hand, is the actual use of the sociolinguistic knowledge one possesses when interacting in society (Hudson, 1988). So, sociolinguistic competence has to be translated into sociolinguistic performance.

Sociolinguistic competence is the knowledge and ability to use language appropriately in any given social context including the awareness of the politeness notions of the target language culture. Knowing the taboos, address forms, register differences, turn taking, knowing when to speak, when to remain silent, as well as the linguistic markers of dialects, accents and so on.

Topic- 111: Sapir Whorf Hypothesis

A hypothesis first advanced by Edward Sapir in 1929 and subsequently developed by Benjamin Whorf. Edward Sapir (1884-1939) was an American anthropologist-linguist. He was a leader in structural linguistics. He was the author of 'Language: An Introduction to the Study of Speech'. He was born in Lauenberg, Germany. Also it is important that he was a pupil of Franz Boas, and teacher of Benjamin Whorf. Benjamin Whorf's life span was from 1897to 1941. He graduated from the MIT in Chemical Engineering and began work as a fire prevention engineer. Although he met, and later studied with Edward Sapir, he never took up linguistics as a profession. Whorf's primary area of interest in linguistics was the study of native American languages. He is well known for his work on the Hopi language. He was a captivating speaker; and popularized his linguistic ideas through popular lectures and articles. He presented the hypothesis that the structure of a language determines a native speaker's perception and categorization of experience. There are certain thoughts of an individual in one language that cannot be utterances, and, ungrammatical utterances may be socially appropriate, just as grammatical utterances can be socially inappropriate.

The Ethnography of Communication

Hymes is best known for his founding role in the ethnography of communication. He proposed the term 'ethnography of speaking'. But later he amended it to 'ethnography of communication'. It was a new approach to understanding language in use (Hymes, 1962, 1964). Ethnographies of communication must 'discover and explicate the competence that enables members of a community to conduct and interpret speech' (Hymes, 1972). The exploration and documentation of communicative competence within a speech community is the essence of the ethnography of communication. As a means to this end, Hymes defines the social units and units of analysis for ethnographies of communication.

The social unit proper to sociolinguistics is the 'speech community'.

By speech community, Hymes does not mean a community defined by common language, but

Language is the medium through which the elite of the Center regulate the Periphery; and plays a crucial function by providing the link between the dominant and the dominated groups; and is representative of the basis upon which the notion of linguistic imperialism is built. Phillipson (1992, p. 47) asserts that the legitimization of English linguistic expansion has been based on two notions:

1. Ethnocentricity
2. Educational policy

'Ethnocentricity' is the "practice of judging other cultures by standards of its own." These two practices are used to impose a distinction between languages+ to promote the notion of the assumed inferiority of secondary languages with respect to the norms determined by the dominant culture.Burns and Coffin et al. 2001, p.78-87) claim that the extent to which English is involved in the political, educational, social and economic life of a country is clearly a result of both the historical legacy of colonialism and of the varying success of countries since independence in warding off the threats of neo-colonialism. In the same way Theo van Leeuwen (in Coulthard et al 1996, p. 55) are of the view, "The English language allows us to make a choice between functionalism and identification, and that the use of this choice in discourse is of critical importance". Graddol (in Burns and Coffin et al. 2001, p.27-8) adds

Topic – 102: Aspects of Linguistic Communication

What is communication? The term comes from the Latin 'comunicare' meaning "to transmit, "Flores de Gortari defines, "Man, society, culture, civilization and progress are concepts that are reciprocally validated in close proximity; but the force that causes these processes to interact from the fundamental fact of existence, just as the flow of blood gives life to physiological man, is communication." According to David K. Berlo: "It is the process by which a transmitter sends a message through a channel to a receiver." In the same way according to Aristotle: "The main purpose of communication is persuasion, that is, the attempt of the speaker to bring others to his point of view." We may consider another definition given by Aranguren: "Communication is the transmission of a message by means of a sender, conduction, and a receiver. Or, the one by André Martinet may be of interest to us who asserts: "It is the utilization of a code for the transmission of a message about a certain experience in semiological units in order to enable human beings to relate to one another."
