Objectives of the Study

To find out the significance of headlines in perspective of discourse and society. To investigate the role of headlines in representations of same event in different ways. To find out the impact of headlines in construction and propagation of ideologies. To find out linguistic similarities / differences in the headlines of various newspapers.

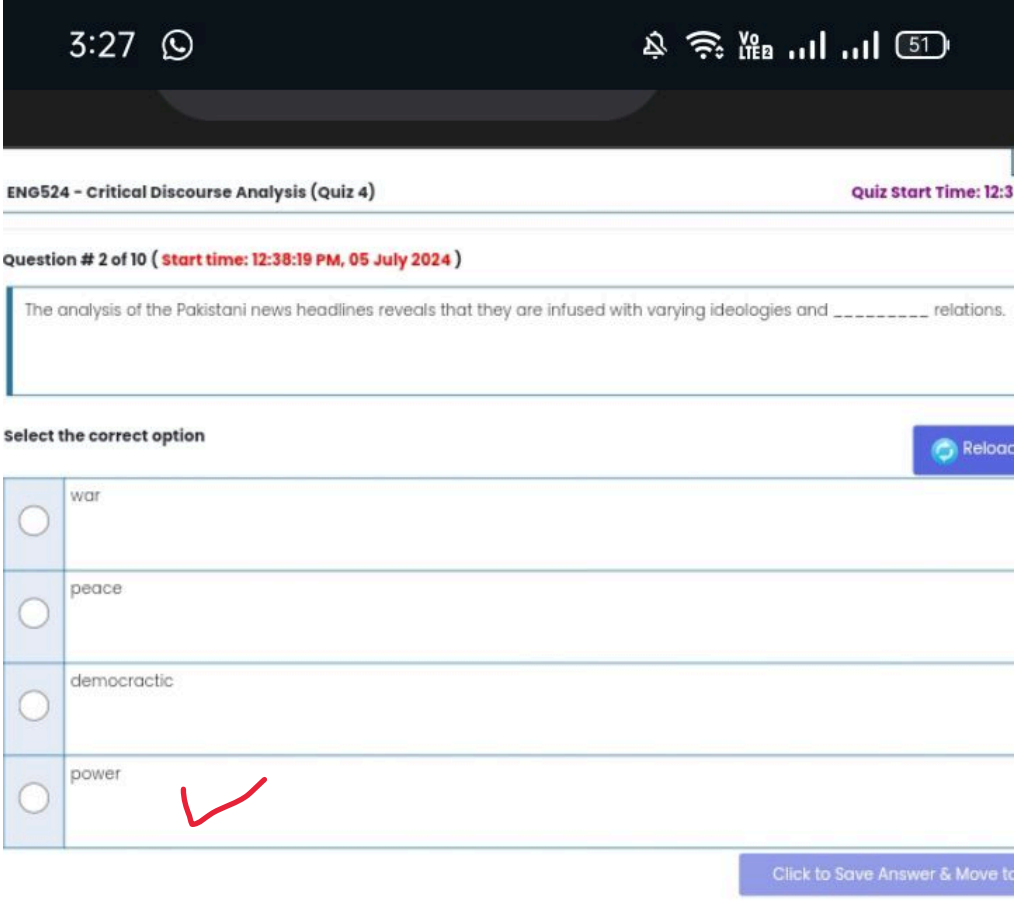

Design of the study

The study adopted an exploratory design. The sample of study consisted of headlines published in Urdu and English newspapers in year 2016 (From January 2016 to August 2016). The analysis of newspaper text has been done by adopting Fairclough & Wodak model (1997) and Van Dijk model (1995). The reason of selecting these models was that both these models are considered best to analyze media text (Keller, 2008; Lagerwerf, 2002).

Findings of the Study

Findings divulge that there is a significant difference of linguistic and discursive markers among headlines of different newspapers. Certain variations in ideology, power and hegemony factors were also found in the news of different newspapers. The apparent reason for using different linguistic and contextual techniques is to create entertainment, sympathy, embarrassment or amusement in the minds of the readers.

The responses of the viewers reveal their dislike for entertainment-oriented, exaggerated, unfair, and moderately informative headlines of news channels.

Topic-180: Language and Power Nexus: A Critical Study of Pakistani Political Discourse

The study presents a critical view of the speech delivered by the prime-minister of Pakistan, Yousuf Raza Gillani on May 09, 2011. This study is an analysis of the speech to see how certain linguistic features have been used to take people in confidence with the help of the most important political position. The present study is qualitative in nature. A critical approach has been used to analyze this speech and some features of critical discourse model presented by Norman Fairclough were selected to look closely into the text. The three-dimensional (Fairclough) model of the analysis of the text. The speech was delivered in the parliament house in front of the speaker. However, the analysis revealed that, the speech was meant for both the addressee present at the time of the speech, and the assumed masses. It was found out the pronouns we, our, were constantly used to shift the responsibility on some external factors/groups. whereas "I" was used to show assertion and authority and also in order to digress the discussion from the topic. The pronouns and the vocabulary together establish the in-group or out-group category. The solidarity is shown towards the masses to get their support and defense is shown towards the allies who are accusing the government of fraud and nefarious ploy. Mystification was performed at a number of places to hide the truth or to claim the truth alternatively.

Topic-181: CDA of Rhetorical Devices used in the Advertisement of Beauty Products in Pakistani Print Media

The purpose of the study was to find the role of rhetoric devices and their use in beauty products advertisements. It also discusses why the representation of gender is necessary to sell the products or to persuade viewers. For this purpose, the study used Critical Discourse Analysis as a research tool. The research was qualitative in nature. Data was collected from beauty products advertisements, which were taken from print media. The advertisements were collected analyze the data. The results drawn from the current study reveal that Jinnah wanted to make Pakistan a liberal, democratic, just and impartial state. It also seems that he was fully aware of the social problems like law and order situation, corruption, bribery, black-marketing, nepotism and jobbery, so he persuaded the members of Constituent Assembly of Pakistan vividly to initiate a war against these evils. The study has its theoretical and practical implications. The results reveal that the text of Jinnah's speech is very rich so far as CDA is concerned. The textual analysis shows that vocabulary items which include wording, re-wording, hyponymy etc. represent Jinnah's stance regarding ethnicity and prevalent social evils in Pakistan. His vocabulary suggests that he wanted to preach justice, equality and impartiality for the whole nation. The analysis of the grammatical features of the speech suggests that he was very loud and clear in his stance. He uttered such sentences as fix the responsibilities on agents and patients unlike the present politicians who are ambiguous. The analysis of the discourse practice throws light on the fact that formal links, contextual links, logical connectors have been used to make

Topic-166: Social media critical discourse studies (SM-CDS)

According to KhosraviNik (2014), initially, Computer Mediated Communication (CMC), e.g., emails and Instant Messaging protocols, was largely ignored by mass media scholars as it resembled interpersonal communication, While linguists took an interest in analyzing such data by bringing in their traditions of analyzing interactions. It is not a surprise that many studies on CMC have tried to adopt and adapt research methods of Conversation Analysis and interactional sociolinguistics. However, there is an emerging literature which foregrounds discursive practice as the central focus of discourse analysis in Social Media (Jones, Chik, and Hafner 2015, Barton and Lee 2013, Norris and Jones 2005). The approach distinguishes the notion of discursive practice from a Faircloughian understanding of the term, which includes scrutiny of processes of production and consumption of discourses in terms of its genre and distribution. The focus may be on 'concrete, situated actions people perform with particular mediational means (such as written texts, mobile phones) in order to enact membership in particular social groups' (Jones, 2015) . Although, in one way or another a CDS understanding of meaning making process would have to account for the context of data, the argument here is that an observational / communicative practice based approach would fit more efficiently for discourse analysis on Social Media. Barton and Lee (2013) argue, 'we need to both closely look at the texts and to observe "users" lives and beliefs about what they do with their online writing'. An emerging hidden agenda. It is concluded that powerful individuals and institutions affect the production of newspapers' discourse in Pakistan. This also highlights a strong nexus between politics and media discourse in the country. The analysis of Daily Times report shows that the newspaper presented a biased version of the story in order to further the cause its powerful aide - then government of Pakistan. The report seemed to conceal important details and deliberately downplay the roles and contributions of important actors of the news event, for example, lawyers, opposition parties and the common people of Pakistan. On the contrary, the other news report appeared to provide its readers a balanced view of the news item analyzed in this study as it highlighted all major actors and events of the happening. The news coverage of international newspaper 'The Guardian' and 'New York Times' also confirmed the presentation of the News report and, therefore, it may expose partiality in Daily Times report. As biased reporting may have serious socio-psychological effects on readers, there is a need to analyze media discourse critically, especially, in the developing countries where people can be easily misled.

framework of Fairclough (1995) And also with the help of other tools, e.g. referential strategies, repetition, word choice, positive self-representation and negative other representation, to study how specific words and phrases carry power to transform the perception and political views of the people.

Findings

It was found that political discourse is often deliberately crafted to project specific ideologies, which are always located in the discourse in an implicit way. Moreover, politicians employ certain linguistic strategies to persuade people to follow their hidden agendas The analysis of Khan's speech shows that he uses ideologically loaded discourse in order to change the perceptions of the people not only about himself, but also about others (his political opponents) and the prevailing political system in the country.Through a tactful use of persuasive linguistic strategies, he attempts to project positive self-representation and negative other representation. Khan's discourse about the ideology of "change" and "new Pakistan" aims at changing political views of people and persuading them to support him in his political struggle. He inte to lead people towards his own specific ideological direction.

Turner 2010), i.e., participants who appear to be themselves and not to be following a script. Reality shows are generally structured around mundane matters or domestic life, and do not hesitate to expose more private and intimate aspects of participants' lives. Another, and closely related, key feature of reality TV is its capacity to provoke emotions (Kavka 2008; Skeggs and Wood 2012). Emotions may appear banal but, as Sayer (2005) points out, they should be viewed as 'evaluative judgements'. Emotions suggest an understanding of one's own position or identity in relation to the object provoking the feelings; they seem to be crucial to processes of otherness because they can create and preserve distinctions between groups of people. Even if the genre appears to be a playful, rather trivial form of entertainment, it involves ideas about how to value and understand participants and the activities they involve. Reality TV can legitimate or de-legitimate social practices and their participants and thereby do ideological work. Lischinsky has presented an approach useful for critically examining reality TV and how it can provoke feelings. This methodology is based on the collections of methods called Multimodal Critical Discourse Analysis (MCDA) theorizing on discourse as recontextualized social practice. A basic assumption is to view actions and artefacts used in communication as semiotic resourc programmes (Lewis 2008b); and themes like race and reality TV (Orbe 2008) and gender and reality TV (Negra, Pike and Radley 2013). There are, however, two more distinctive perspectives that take a more critical interest in reality TV and discuss it in relation to its societal and political consequences and the spread of neoliberal ideology. Lischinsky has present these two in more detail. With a starting point in Foucault's theorising on governmentality, the first sees reality TV as a cultural technology. This aims at fostering people to be good citizens - the aim of transforming them into better and happier versions of themselves; involve learning how to be more open-minded, flexible and prepared to collaborate with others. Explores the ways these programmes foster 'good' self-enterprising citizens - a means for supporting discourses in line with neoliberal policies- as e.g. mechanisms for individualization. The other is based on post-Marxist theories and focuses on reality TV and how it can legitimate class differences. One class is shown as superior over another, i.e. upper class prefers particular food or products - exclude others preserve their own advantages. More research needs to be done on how reality TV works to evaluate personhood more generally.

Taliban vs. those killed and injured. How the same issue has been taken up by two different papers in two different cultural settings? The ideological square model of Van Dijk was employed as the theoretical framework for the study. The schema of "Us versus them" was used to identify how the Taliban are depicted as 'them' and the victims as 'us'. This was done through the examination of the lexical choices and syntactic structures. Results reveal that The New York Times has dealt with the issue in a more impartial manner than Dawn. The attackers are clearly identified as Taliban and the 'us' sentiment is as clear as the 'them' sentiment. Dawn on other hand hardly mentions the attackers as Taliban but often terms them as militants. The sentiment is more prominent here in comparison to 'them'.

Wodak and Meyer (2015) have focused on other part of CDA, i.e., analysis of 'nonverbal (semiotic, multimodal, visual) aspects of interaction and communication: Such as gesture, images, film, the internet and multimedia' as appropriate targets. For film analysis, both written and spoken language are focused. Even apparently spontaneous spoken language, with all its 'paraverbal' dimensions of performance and social, regional and ethnic variation, becomes in the context of film just another representational resource. Such language choices can then naturally be seen as targets of CDA. According to Androutsopoulos (2012), the employment of code switching in films depicting ethnically diverse situations and several similar phenomena have all received critical consideration.
