Assignment 1

ABSTRACT

This comprehensive collection of notes is accurately crafted to empower students to excel academically, ensuring they achieve a minimum of 80% marks in their examinations. The content is organized with clarity and precision, focusing on key concepts, critical analyses, and practical applications tailored to the syllabus. These notes serve as a reliable resource for both thorough preparation and last-minute revision. Designed to inspire confidence and mastery, this guide is an essential tool for students striving for academic excellence.

Teacher's Perception Regarding the Use of the Communicative Language Teaching in English Classroom at Secondary Level in Burewala

Conversational skills or the communication skills are the most important factors for learning any language of the world. In a multilingual country where English is used as the official language; its teaching and learning also becomes compulsory. The value of learning English language communication have increased along with the increasing centuries (Denkci-Akkas, 2016). A large number of people have the knowledge of English and they can understand the context but they are not able to communicate in English. In Pakistani educational system teaching of English language has been an important thing from the beginning. Teaching of English language to their children is considered as a matter of prestige for the Pakistani parents. English is added in the beginning of the educational level and the Pakistani children begin learning English language from the basics for that sounds and English alphabets. The students feel it difficult for them to communicate the language that they have been learning from the start of their education. The students feel comfortable in English reading, listening and writing; however communicating it becomes difficult task for them. Communication is considered as an important factor and a milestone to achieve.

Communicative language teaching method is end-to-end a learner-centered approach. It includes the practical communication of the language as compared to the learning of the grammatical, vocabulary or the other language rules. It was introduced because of the limitations of the traditional methods for teaching a language. The traditional methods sharpen the grammatical rules of the students however these methods cannot make a student confident to use that language in their real life. Although CLT method has clear advantages for learning communication skills but even then implementations of this method in the classrooms is still a topic of debate. Teachers lack the resources of using CLT method in the classrooms and even the educational authorities do not allow its implementations due to the large syllabus or assessments that are purely based on only the grammar and the vocabulary.

As stated above that the adoption of CLT approach in the classroom increases the conversational skills of the students, different researches have been done in this field. The researchers explored the attitudes of the teachers and the behavior of the students and determined the issues faced in the implications of CLT in classrooms (Anderson, 1993). However, CLT approach is also used in the classrooms in many of the inner circle nations. This study explores the barriers faced by the teachers in implementing CLT in the classrooms and also highlights the strategies that can be helpful in its effectiveness in different context of learning. This study investigates the implementations and impacts of using CLT method in the English classrooms; aiming to provide the clear insights regarding its effectiveness for improving the conversational skills of secondary level students.

Personal Motivations

We are the students of applied linguistics, therefore our interest towards the language teaching and learning methods is natural. We have been taught English from the primary level to the intermediate level by using the traditional methods. When we came to the university level we had to face some challenges while communicating and this made our mind do this research. Therefore we decided to choose this field for research so that we can find out the effectiveness of using CLT method for teaching English.

Statement of the Problem

To help in developing the second language leaning, CLT methods are used by the private teachers in Pakistan from the elementary level of the education. Different issue are faced by the school administrations or the educational authorities in implementing CLT methods in the Pakistani classrooms of English language (Nunan, 2003). The lack of the teachers professional teaching skills, large number of class, the syllabus to be covered, limited time of the classroom and the limited teaching resources are few issues that are highlighted by different researchers in their investigations. This is why it is important to understand all the aspects of implementing CLT in the classrooms (Li, 1998). The most common factor of the hurdle faced for implementing CLT method for teaching that was observed through literature related to CLT was the class size (Hu, 2005). Therefore this research is conducted to highlight the teacher's perceptions regarding the usage of CLT methods in teaching English to the secondary levels of the classrooms.

Objectives of the Study

- To explore the positive impacts of CLT for teaching English in the secondary level classrooms of Burewala.
- To find out the English teacher's perception regarding the use of CLT in classrooms.

Research Questions

- What are the positive impacts of CLT for teaching English in the secondary level classrooms of Burewala?
- What are the English teacher's perception regarding the use of CLT in classrooms at secondary level in Burewala?

Significance of the Study

This research will be significant for the teachers because through this research they would be able to find the effectiveness of using CLT approach for teaching in English classrooms. This research would be significant for the educational authorities as it would highlight the importance of learning a language without using the traditional methods. This research is also significant because it adds a critical gap for future researchers regarding the practical implications of CLT method. The findings of this research will be significant for the policymakers as it will highlight the development of the curriculum and improved language teaching method. This research would be significant as it would highlight the benefits of implementing the usage of CLT in the classrooms based on the teacher's perceptions and this would also be helpful in removing the barriers of CLT implementations in the English classrooms.

Delimitation

This research is limited to the following:

- Teacher's perceptions
- Communicative language Teaching
- Secondary level
- Burewala

LITERATURE REVIEW

A fresh and evolving strategy called the "communicative language teaching method" aims to enhance student communication in and out of the classroom. According to Abate (2014), CLT is a technique that was first created in the 20th century. According to Richard (2001), changes made to British situational language methods in the late 1960s promoted the use of communicative teaching techniques. These European expert bodies are aware of the changes (Richard & Rodgers, 2001). According to Savignon (1991), after understanding that widely used language techniques had been created, educators, applied linguists, and other stakeholders advocated for a communicative approach in the 1960s in both Europe and the US. Social and psychological theories serve as the main theoretical pillars of communicative teaching methods. He emphasized speaking, which is the process of developing communication skills (Savignon, 1991).

The concept of communicative competence emphasizes the ability to communicate via a number of auditory devices in a range of social circumstances (Brown, 2007). Grammar understanding, sociolinguistic skill, and awareness of language usage norms are all components of social context (Savignon, 1991). Psychological and sociocultural theories are the most valuable cognitive resources for CLT. It put a lot of focus on communication skills, which suggests that young children's communication skills should be developed (Savignon, 1991). Contributions to the communicative technique, which is theoretical and useful in language training, have come from a multitude of academics and researchers. An abstract rule machine that maximizes the auditory system's statistics for the grammar of the languages it utilizes is referred to as "speaker's linguistic competence" (Chomsky). Nonetheless, he argues that spatial audio systems also incorporate an intricate set of guidelines known as "communicative competence" (Abate, 2014). The ramifications of CLT have a significant influence on the field of ELT. "Despite the lack of consensus among experts regarding the suitability of CLT for China, the Ministry of Education was encouraged by the use of the atypical profile, believing it would provide a convincing solution to the significant problem of low ability of university college students. "People still use English for communication, despite years of official language monitoring (Hu, 2005). "Many years have passed since the CLT approach was introduced in Korea, but despite curriculum reforms and the passage of time, many Koreans are living without the effectiveness of the English language communication technique" (Vasilopoulos, 2008). An empirical study was conducted from Pakistan's point of view to ascertain the importance of utilizing communication techniques in ELT.

"CLT gives teachers a satisfying experience, helps pupils communicate orally in a foreign language, and increases the confidence of beginners. CLT offers the capacity to understand expressions. Although the GTM provides a range of language teaching methodologies, the communicative approach—which emphasizes teaching grammar over language itself—is the most successful because it creates an immediate link between the instructor and the learner (Akram and Mehmood, 2011). English's function as an international language, the language of research, technical knowledge and competence, interchange, verbal communication, and workplaces is inherently hampered by Pakistan. Proficiency in spoken and written English is now necessary for both social and professional progress (Mansoor, 2004). This is why Pakistani primary colleges and higher education institutions such as universities and schools have made it a mandatory subject to teach. Nevertheless, once Pakistan gained its independence, English continued to be the official language there. Pakistan's school system is not conducive to learning English.

Warsi (2004) argues that despite the fact that students are mostly from rural areas and that English is taught as a mandatory language from elementary school through college, they are nonetheless able to communicate in English fluently. They are all four weak in language proficiency. This situation is primarily the result of the Pakistani educational system. The techniques used in English language training are very set in stone. English is taught as a second language in Pakistan. Some people speak Urdu, the national language, as their native tongue. English will turn into a second language for them. However, English is the official language and Urdu is the second language for those whose mother tongues are other languages, such as Sindhi, Pashto, Punjabi, and many more (Warsi, 2004). Despite the fact that English is Pakistan's second language, Ahmed et al., (2011) argue that the nation's English language curriculum does not meet all of the required curriculum standards. The teachers don't act professionally and don't have the necessary training materials. Teachers use contextually relevant materials and antiquated pedagogical approaches while teaching English as a second language. Proficiency tests in English have demonstrated that classroom language education does not employ the most recent methods of assessment and evaluation (Warsi, 2004).

Except for areas related to language, all disciplines taught in higher education institutions, including colleges and universities, are taught in English (Mashori, 2010). English is taught as a first language in language and literature studies and is mandatory in Pakistani schools and institutions. Unfortunately, instead of utilizing the specific ELT-based communicative teaching methodologies, English professors at these universities still educate their students using the traditional lecture style in which they were taught (Raja, 2012). Pakistani universities are at capacity when it comes to English instruction. Private universities provide a range of English language courses, such as ESP, EAP, TESOL, TEFL, and English for Purpose. Another service offered to students by some non-government universities is pre-sessional English guides. Since the majority of college students at public universities come from staff members who speak English in a vernacular or non-elite manner, ESL or functional English guides are offered to assist students in overcoming their natural tendency towards the language. Publications in ESL/Functional English are consequently seen as essential in assisting students in meeting their educational needs (Mansoor, 2004).

English language courses are supplied in big element at the undergraduate degree in conjunction with a few stage specially specific departments of the public universities. With assistance from the English Institute, these courses are offered in specialized departments within institutions. These institutions also hire academics to teach English as a mandatory subject; full-time instructors are expected to instruct core discipline students in English literature or linguistics. The departments involved in professional universities manage the English language program. Teachers in the English language program develop English guidelines on their own. The evaluation of the guides focuses on information and substance such effective paragraph writing and communication problems as well as practical language abilities (Shamim, 2011). There is a damage to English language instruction in private schools. Certain restrictions brought about by extensive training make it more difficult for instructors and students to teach and learn the English language. The course material becomes meaningless and meaningless.

According to different researches on CLT method, it is seen that the maximum number of students in one class cause problems in implementing this method (Shamim, 2011). The unlimited rules and the pressure of completing the syllabus on time decreases the opportunities of using innovative teaching methods in the classrooms. The teachers need to perform as a ruler instead of just an instructor to introduce new ways of teaching in the classrooms in such cases (Raja, 2012). It can be analyzed from the already done research work that the traditional methods were used for teaching to the students in the schools and the colleges (Raja, 2012). It is a need to grow the teaching styles and add new methods in teacher trainings for teaching in the classrooms of multilingual societies. His paper aimed to explore the large-class issues faced by the teachers in teaching at the university level. Mostly teacher uses lecture-technique for teaching ate the university level for teaching English. CLT should be used for teaching at this higher level of education to overcome the difficulties that the students will face in the future (Raja, 2012). In another research, it was argued that the innovative ways of learning a language interact the students for learning (Savignon, 1991) and (Richard & Rodgers, 2001).

In Pakistani context, the interactive trainings are not given to the teachers for teaching in different styles, they just follow the previously used teaching techniques with which they have been taught through for their students (Bughio, 2013). Teachers avoid innovative method of teaching English due to the large class size (Jimakorn & Singhasiri, 2006). Although the CLT is not considered as an attractive method for teaching to the English language students because it causes problems in the management of the class (Naidu, 1992). According to him the collaborative language teaching methods i.e. group work create a disorganized situation that becomes difficult for the teachers to control. The implementation of CLT becomes a difficult task for the teachers due to several reasons as stated above.
