Chomsky notion of linguistic competence and Performance?

Chomsky introduced the idea of 'linguistic competence', which means a person's natural knowledge of language – like knowing words and how to put them together. He also introduced generative grammar theory. He explained that competence is the grammar rules people know in their minds, even if they don't realize it. Sociolinguistic competence means understanding how language works in social, cultural, and linguistic situations. Its importance goes beyond just its basic meaning.

Performance, on the other hand, is how people actually use this knowledge when they speak or write (Coupland et al., 1997). In terms of sociolinguistics, performance is the actual use of the sociolinguistic knowledge one possesses when interacting in society (Hudson, 1988). Sociolinguistic performance is the skill of using this knowledge in real-life situations.

Native speakers?

A native speaker is a person who has acquired a language from early childhood as their first language (L1) and uses it naturally and fluently. Being a native speaker gives a sense of community, and with that, a sense of identity. Being a native speaker of English gives you a different identity from the group of individuals who are native speakers of French. A native speaker is not based on ethnicity or nationality, but on the first language learned naturally from birth.

Example:

A child born in Pakistan who learns Urdu at home from birth is a native speaker of Urdu.

Two descents involved in kinships?

Kinship terms are the terms used to name relationships in a particular society. The meanings of kinship terms reflect the relationships among kith and kin in each particular society. Kinship refers to the culturally defined relationships between individuals who are commonly thought of as having family ties. There are two types of descent involved in kinship.

1) Patrilineal are the relations that come from the father's blood line.
2) Matrilineal are the relations that come from the mother's blood line.

Decreolization?

This happens when a creole language is spoken in a country where people also speak the original language from which the creole took most of its words for example English. Because the original language is seen as more prestigious, creole speakers often start using forms closer to that language, creating mixed varieties between the two.

Sociolinguists call:

- The creole the BASILECT
- The prestige language the ACROLECT
- With the intermediate varieties lumped together as MESOLECTS

This range of varieties spanning between basilect and acrolect is called a 'POST-CREOLE CONTINUUM'. This term shows how many different middle varieties (mesolects) exist between the two extremes. Each mesolect can be a full way of speaking for a group of people. The basilect is usually very different from the acrolect – like how Tok Pisin differs from English – so there are many language features that change independently between the two. Each mesolect is a mix of words and grammar from both the basilect and the acrolect. This means that different people might mix these in different ways, creating many different ways of speaking that can seem confusing or disorganized.

Language Contact in Pakistan?

Language Contact is when speakers of different languages or dialects interact with each other, causing their languages to influence one another. Pakistan has multiple languages and dialects as well as multiple identities. There is one official language (English), a national language (Urdu), and many regional languages spoken across the country.

An average Pakistani uses different languages in different situations—at school, in markets, in businesses, on the streets, at home, and with friends. Another important factor is multilingualism, which means that speaking many languages is normal in Pakistani society. This brings up issues like linguistic identity (how language relates to people's sense of who they are) and related social problems.

In such a multilingual society, the mixing of languages creates a complicated situation, as people are pulled in different directions by social and cultural influences. Because of language contact, people often switch between languages (called code-switching), mix words from different languages (code-mixing), stop using their native language over time (language shift), or even completely abandon it (language desertion).

Relationship of oral literature and sociolinguistics?

Oral literature is a broad term that may include ritual texts, curative chants, epic poems, musical genres, folk tales, songs, myths, spells, legends, proverbs, riddles, tongue-twisters, word games, recitations, historical narratives. A Ugandan scholar, Pio Zirimu, introduced the term 'orature' in this regard which is a combination of 'oral' and 'literature'. The term "oral literature" is sometimes used interchangeably with "folklore," but it usually has a broader focus. It forms a generally more fundamental component of culture. For many people around the world—where history and traditions are still conveyed more through speech than in writing— the transmission of oral literature from one generation to the next lies at the heart of culture. Very often, local languages act as vehicles for the transmission of unique forms of cultural knowledge. It may be composed in performance; and transmitted orally over generations. For example, many Scottish and Irish ballads that have been brought to Canada; or written down specifically for oral performance.

Study of oral literature from sociolinguistic perspective provides insights into how people think, what they believe in, and what they appreciate. In this case, examples may include rich African oral tradition and African proverbs. The significance of performance in oral literature goes beyond a mere matter of definition.

Explain Ethnography of Communication?

Hymes is best known for his founding role in the ethnography of communication. He proposed the term 'ethnography of speaking'. But later he amended it to 'ethnography of communication'. It was a new approach to understanding language in use (Hymes, 1962, 1964). Ethnography of Communication is the study of how people use language in their cultural and social settings. It looks at who says what, to whom, when, where, and why.

Examples:

- Greetings in Pakistan
- Wedding Speeches
- Storytelling Traditions

According to Hymes, (1962, 1964):

1) It should study how language is used in real-life situations to find common ways people speak.
2) It should focus on a whole community and study all its ways of communication.
3) It should not separate language from its purpose – instead, it should study how people use language in their social and cultural life.
4) It is used as a method for research.
5) It depends on practical, real-world studies (called empirical studies).

Explain the Process of Language Accommodation?

Generally, speaking accommodation is the process by which participants in a conversation adjust their accent, diction, or other aspects of language according to the speech style of the other participant. A key question is: Why does a speaker choose one variety (X) of a language (A) instead of another variety (Y), or even choose language A instead of language B? Many possible answers have been suggested to explain this choice:

- solidarity
- accommodation to listeners
- choice of topic
- perceived social and cultural distance

A speaker's motivation is important, even if they don't realize it. People often don't notice when they choose one language variety or mix languages. Usually, speakers try to adjust their way of speaking to match what others expect from them. Sometimes, they do this on purpose. This process is called accommodation, which helps explain how people connect with each other through language.

- Convergence: This means changing your speech to sound more like the other person. You might speak more formally to impress someone important (upward convergence), or speak more casually like ordinary people (downward convergence)—as politicians often do to connect with voters.
- Divergence: This means changing your speech to sound less like the other person, to show difference or distance. For example, acting fancy or using formal language to separate yourself from others.

Morgan six basic patterns of kinship terminologies?

1) Hawaiian kinship: Only distinguishes between sex and generation. Thus, siblings and cousins are not distinguished the same terms are used for both types of relatives.

2) Sudanese kinship: No two types of relatives share the same term. Siblings are distinguished from cousins, and different terms are used for each type of cousin i.e. father's brother's children, father's sister's children, etc.

3) Eskimo kinship: In addition to sex and generation, it also distinguishes between lineal relatives those related directly by a line of descent and collateral relatives those related by blood, but not directly in the line of descent.

4) Iroquois kinship: In addition to sex and generation, it also distinguishes between siblings of opposite sexes in the parental generation. A genealogical relationship traced through a pair of siblings of the same sex is classed as a blood relationship but one traced though a pair of siblings of the opposite sex can be considered an in-law relationship. In other words, siblings are grouped together with parallel cousins, while separate terms are used for cross-cousins. Also, one calls one's mother's sister "mother" and one's father's brother "father".

5) Crow kinship: Like Iroquois, but further distinguishes between one's mother's side and one's father's side. Number of relatives belonging to one's father's matrilineage are grouped together, ignoring generational differences, so that the same term is used for both one's father's sister and one's father's sister's daughter, etc.

6) Omaha kinship: Like Iroquois, with the addition that a number of relatives belonging to one's mother's patrilineage are grouped together, ignoring generational differences, so that the same term is used for both one's mother's brother and one's mother's brother's son.

Example:s

- Haitian Creole (based on French, now a full language)
- Jamaican Creole (Patois) (based on English, spoken in Jamaica)

Politeness strategies?

Brown and Levinson outline four main types of politeness strategies:

1) bald on-record (Direct, clear, no softening.)
2) negative politeness (Indirect, respectful, shows you don't want to bother the person.)
3) positive politeness (Friendly, shows closeness or familiarity.)
4) off-record (Very indirect, hinting without asking directly.)

Explain Language Desertion?

Language Desertion means when people stop using their native language and switch to another language, often permanently. This usually happens when People feel their own language is less useful or less prestigious. Language alternation and hybridization generate desertion. Attitude of the speakers towards the mixed variety correlates with the attitude towards the language they desert. Due to the spread of English the local and regional languages are gradually losing their identity as they are being abandoned by the speakers.

In Pakistan, local languages are slowly being abandoned. People are leaving their local languages for Urdu, and now Urdu itself is being replaced by English. This shows two extremes: keeping a language (maintenance) and leaving a language (desertion). In Pakistan, many languages are currently being deserted.

For example:

- Punjabi is being ignored by its own speakers. People see it as just part of their culture, not something useful for work or daily communication. It's mostly used in villages, not cities.
- A small village speaks its local language, but over time, everyone starts speaking Urdu or English for work and school. Slowly, the village's original language disappears. This is language desertion.

What are blessings and curses in language?

Blessings:

Blessings are expressions of gratitude or wishes for others. Generally, elders use blessing expressions. It Creates identity and belonging Language is a blessing when it connects people.

For example: English helps people from different countries talk and work together.

Cursing:

Cursing is seen as a way of threatening someone using words, where the speaker wishes something bad or unlucky to happen to the other person. People often use curses to blame or hurt others with their words. In these Strong languages can kill weaker languages (language death).

Example: People may laugh at you if you speak a different language.

    - ❖ Spoken and written communication

Define input hypothesis?

The input hypothesis developed by linguist Stephen Krashen makes a distinction between language acquisition and language learning (acquisition–learning distinction), claiming that acquisition is a subconscious process, whereas learning is a conscious one. According to this hypothesis, the acquisition process in L2 (Language 2) is the same as L1 (Language 1) acquisition. The learning process is consciously learning and inputting the language being learned. However, this goes as far as to state that input is all that is required for acquisition. Sociocultural approaches reject the notion that SLA is a purely psychological phenomenon, and attempt to explain it in a social context. Some key social factors that influence SLA are the level of immersion, connection to the L2 community, and gender.

Scope of teaching sociolinguistics?

The issue of concern is the significance and scope of teaching of sociolinguistics. Its scope includes the international and interdisciplinary diversity of the field in representing the broad view of sociolinguistics. Together with second language research and teaching (which itself owes much to sociolinguistic work), sociolinguistics is the central discipline of applied linguistics. It has practical outcomes for education policy, government spending, social affairs, constitutional arrangements, international relations, debates on ethnicity, nationalism, multiculturalism and cultural values. Significance and scope of teaching sociolinguistics in relation to other disciplines can be understood by relating it to the following disciplines:

Explain Eng as global language?

English as a Global Language means that English is used all over the world for communication between people from different countries. People from different countries speak different native languages, but many of them use English as a common language to understand each other. It serves as an official or second language in many countries, including Pakistan, India, and Nigeria. English is the primary language used in international communication, business, education, science, and media. Most universities across the globe use English as the medium of instruction, especially in fields like science and technology. It is also the dominant language on the internet, in films, and in global news channels. Due to its vast usage in so many important areas, English connects people from different cultures and countries, making it the most powerful tool for global interaction. Its role in international trade, diplomacy, and education has firmly established English as the global language of the modern world.

- ✓ Khana bohat tasty hai.

(English + Urdu word mixed in one sentence) and (Half Urdu, half English in one sentence)

Inter-sentential switching:

- ❖ Switching between two languages between sentences.
- ❖ One sentence is in one language, the next sentence is in another.

Example:

- Khana bohat acha hai but I don't feel like eating
- woh bohat zaheen hai and I like intelligent people.

Explain Second Language Acquisition and Sociolinguistics?

L2 (language 2) acquisition is the process by which people learn a second language. The field of second-language acquisition is a sub-discipline of applied linguistics, but also receives research attention from a variety of other disciplines such as sociolinguistics. The primary factor driving SLA appears to be the language input that learners receive. Learners become more advanced the longer they are immersed in the language they are learning. The input hypothesis developed by linguist Stephen Krashen makes a distinction between language acquisition and language learning (acquisition–learning distinction), claiming that acquisition is a subconscious process, whereas learning is a conscious one. According to this hypothesis, the acquisition process in L2 (Language 2) is the same as L1 (Language 1) acquisition. The learning process is consciously learning and inputting the language being learned. However, this goes as far as to state that input is all that is required for acquisition. Sociocultural approaches reject the notion that SLA is a purely psychological phenomenon, and attempt to explain it in a social context. Some key social factors that influence SLA are the level of immersion, connection to the L2 community, and gender.

Explain Issues of Data Collection in Sociolinguistics?

Data collection in sociolinguistics is of crucial significance and due to its significance, the issues attached to it also become significant. Various data collection techniques are employed in analyzing social variation and language use. There are various options available such as:

1) Working with the existing data
2) Generating new data
3) The sociolinguistic interview
4) Free conversation
5) Issues

However, there are various problems in this regard. The first and the foremost problem is of the availability of natural setting. Also, the role of the interviewer and the effect of the interviewer effect cannot be denied. For example, Trudgill (1986) noticed that when he talked to people in interviews, he started speaking like them. This means his way of talking changed to match the people he was interviewing. Interviews are a good way to collect language information, but they also have some problems. Some ways of speaking are hard to collect in interviews. People might only use their natural local language when talking to their friends, not in interviews. Even special tests cannot always help researchers find the language forms they need (Edwards, 1986; Milroy, 1987).

Researchers can also use polling methods to collect language data. Polls can be useful when studying large groups, like people in a whole city or state. But there are different types of polls—like face-to-face, mail, or phone polls—and each has its own problems.

For example, when studying a minority language, the researcher must know that language very well. The researcher must decide whether to do the interviews themselves, hire a local person who speaks like the community (Trudgill, 2010), or use other methods (Wolfram, 2011). Another problem is that sometimes there are no good grammar books, dialect studies, or language history records to help in the research. Also, sometimes the language features being studied don't give enough clear data to follow Labov's (1972) rule for properly analyzing language use.

linguistic imperialism?

Linguistic imperialism means when one powerful language spreads and dominates over other smaller languages, often because of political, economic, or cultural power. According to Phillipson (1992, p. 52), imperialism is a type of relationship whereby "one society or collective in more general terms can dominate another" and which manifests itself in a variety of ways: economically, politically, militarily, culturally and socially. For Galtung, the world can be divided into two domains:

- the Center (the powerful Western countries)
- the Periphery (the developing ones)

Example: In many countries, people use English in schools, jobs, and media, while their local languages are ignored or forgotten. This is called linguistic imperialism.

Why are people giving up their mother languages?

People are slowly stopping the use of their mother languages (also called heritage or native languages) due to social, educational, and economic pressures. This process is known as language shift.

Main Reasons:

1) Preference for Dominant Languages
2) Modern Education System
3) Urbanization and Migration
4) Social Pressure
5) Lack of Transmission
6) To get better jobs

Dominant religious language in Pakistan?

The dominant religious language in Pakistan is Arabic. As far as the domain of religion is concerned, in Pakistan Arabic is the main language. However, for everyday less formal usage, Urdu is used. English, as it has emerged as a more common medium of code mixing, it has also found its way into modern religious discourse. In this regard, we need to think about the 'religion and media' relationship, and the contribution of media. Language choices on media have a strong influence on the society.

Arabic is the main religious language because:

- The Quran is written in Arabic.
- Prayers (Salah) are offered in Arabic.
- Most Islamic religious terms and teachings are in Arabic.

What is Language Maintenance?

Language maintenance means keeping and using a language even when a stronger or more popular language is spreading in the area. It happens when people in a community try to protect and continue using their old language. This can be seen when people keep using their language in daily life, even though a bigger or more powerful language is trying to take its place.

Example: People speaking Punjabi at home even when they live in cities where Urdu is common.

Define An Idiom?

An idiom is a phrase that does not mean exactly what the words say. Instead, it has a hidden or special meaning.

Example:

1) A piece of cake – Something very easy.
2) Once in a blue moon – Very rarely.
3) It's raining cats and dogs – It's raining heavily.
4) Break the ice – To start a conversation.

Note on Language hybridization?

As the very word 'hybrid' indicates, it refers to the process of the fusion of two languages. In fact, hybridization is a product of code mixing. When two codes are mixed, they constitute a third code that has structural characteristics special to that new code. Language hybridization is a resultant process of frequent code mixing. When two or more languages are frequently mixed resultantly a new hybridized variety of language takes birth. This new variety to some extent shares the qualities of both the languages. But it has its own independent grammar and vocabulary that may not match any of the mixed languages. According to Backus (2000): "The frequent use of intrasentential code switching refers to a "bilingual lect" or what Alvarez-Caccamo mentions as an "alloy" (833)". "The speakers over all use a single mixed 'lect', where the users probably do not think that they are switching between two languages; rather they take it as one single language". Language hybridization can lead to the process of language desertion.

For example: aj mai nay bara tasty kofta curry banaya hai. (Noun Phrase Hybridization)

Note on National Languages of Pakistan? Also T/F and fill in the Blanks from this topic

The linguistic situation of Pakistan is a highly complex arena with several regional languages, a national language (Urdu) and English as an international language/ as a foreign/as second language. There is immense regional and linguistic diversity in Pakistan. We have Pakhtuns, Balochis, Punjabis, and Sindhis. Diverse cultural traditions exist and people speak different languages. There are also more than 7 million Muhajirs. From a linguistic standpoint this is an amalgam of heterogeneous groups with widely different linguistic characteristics.

Urdu is the official language. But it is not the first language of the majority. Urdu is written in a modified version of the Persian script, from right to left. It is not indigenous to Pakistan and in its literary form it emphasizes words of Persian and Arabic origin. It enjoys great prestige as a symbol of the Pakistan movement and as the national language of Pakistan. The greatest concentration of speakers of Urdu is in Punjab and Karachi. If within the hierarchy of languages English comes on the top, second position goes to Urdu. Urdu is preferred against all the regional and local languages for use in all the formal situations, though with the passage of time English is taking its place in the formal sphere of life. In spite of its status as the national language, however, only a few percent of Pakistanis speak Urdu as their first language.

Since independence it has the status as a national language, but there has always been a demand for cultural autonomy in other provinces, and resentment against discriminating govt. policies. There is a tension between Urdu and local languages on one level, and Urdu and English on the other level. But Urdu has always been favored in all the language policies.

Dense and loose networks?

A dense network is one where the members all know each other directly.

For example, if you ask five people, "Who did you talk to yesterday?" and all of them say only each other's names, it means they all talk only within their small group. This is called a strong or very close network.

In a loose network, people know each other less closely. Members of the group may not all know one another.

Example: Urban workplaces, big cities, or university settings where people meet many different people.

The Future of Sociolinguistics as a Discipline?

Sociolinguistics began in the 1960s by combining ideas from sociology, anthropology, and linguistics. In the future, this subject can grow a lot because it easily connects with other subjects. Sociolinguists can work together with people from different fields in both teaching and research. This can help improve the ways they study language and society.

But even after many years, sociologists and linguists do not work together much. Many sociologists don't learn language study skills, and many linguists don't help with sociology research. Still, in today's world, where life is complicated and people are very different, working together can help understand how people talk and how societies change.

In the future, sociolinguists can study:

- How people learn reading and do well in school.
- How talking can unite people or separate them.
- How speaking styles can cause unfair treatment or prejudice.

Labov, a famous expert, said we can't really guess the future of language studies and should let it grow naturally. The future of sociolinguistics depends on whether studying language change can help us better understand people and language.

Best of Luck ☺🙃
