Code-switching is a linguistic strategy of bilingual or multilingual speakers that is used to make switches between two or more languages depending on audience, setting and purpose. It can be called the "juxtaposition within the same speech exchange of passages of speech belonging to two different grammatical systems or sub-systems" (Gumperz, 1982, p.59) According to Yua (1997), withi communicative exchange the use of more than one language is called code-switching. Social class is a central concept in sociolinguistic research, one of the small nu variables by which speech communities are stratified. Trudgill(1974) asserts, "most members of society have some kind of idea, intuitive or otherwise, of what social class is," and both specialists a laypeople agree. Social class is often defined in an ad hoc way which is very ironic because it is a ve important variable in sociolinguistic studies. recorded speech that is needed for quantitative analysis."
Quantitative analysis requires data that must be obtained in a very formal way.

Modern approaches to style, however, are as follows:

1. Indexical order

According to Penny Eckert's theory, any linguistic variable has its own indexical field spanning any number of potential meanings. The meanings actually associated with the variables are determined by social context and the style in which the variable is being used. These indexical fields are fluid and change depending on usage in different contexts.

2. Ideology

In Judith Irvine's conception of style she emphasizes the fact that a style is defined only within a social framework. A variant and the social meanings it indexes are not inherently linked, rather, the social meanings exist as ideologically mediated interpretations made by members of the social framework.

Topic – 067: Code Mixing and Sociolinguistics

Referring to the different characteristics and features of code-mixing, various linguists have defined it in different ways. For instance Odlin (1989) asserts, "Language mixing is the merging of characteristics of two or more languages in any verbal communication." In contrast to this loosely constructed definition, Hammink (2000) defines intrasentential switching (code-mixing) as switching that takes place at the clause, phrase level, or at word level if no morphological adaptation occurs. Wardhaugh (1992) characterizes that code mixing occurs when during conversation, speakers use both languages together to the extent that they shift from one language to the other in the course of a single utterance. Code-mixing is one of the major kinds of language choice that is subtler than code-switching. In code-

Topic – 65: Measuring Bilingualism

There are certain issues related to the measurement of bilingualism. Bilingualism is a complex phenomenon and equally complex is the issue of the measurement of bilingualism. The definition of a bilingual varies from a person's ability to use a few words of L2 to a person's proficiency in the use of two or more languages. Kachru (1969) has also discussed different types of bilingualism, and he refers to the continuum of bilingualism using three measuring points: a zero point, a central and an upper point (p.284). Zero point refers to competence in very restricted domains such as counting. Richards (1974) gives the example of African market women who have a very limited knowledge of English that they use to attract the customers towards the items they are selling.

In the Philippines context the level of 'halo-halo' (mix-mix) speech is another example. Also in Saudi Arabia, during hajj when people from all over the world gather the local shopkeepers use their limited English to communicate. (1980) work in King of Prussia, Philadelphia, revealed: children moving into the area before the age of 8 or 9 were able to acquire certain local vowel shifts. In terms of language development in children, Labov (1972) suggests that acquisition of the local dialect takes place from the ages of 4 to 13, when speech patterns are dominated by the pre-adolescent group.

Adolescence is perhaps the most researched life stage. According to Eckert (1998), adolescents lead the entire age spectrum in sound change and in the general use of vernacular variables, and this lead is attributed to adolescents' engagement in constructing identities in opposition to or at least independently of – their elders. Adulthood covers the gulf between adolescence and old age, and it is perhaps the least explored life stage. The movement through adulthood, which can be shaped by stages in career development and parenthood, is largely unexamined. As far as old age is concerned, in terms of language, old age is often approached from a clinical perspective: studies on the effects of loss of hearing or Aphasia etc. Little sociolinguistic work has been undertaken on old age as a life stage. The speaker's age-related place in society is complex, and the linguistic life course that he or she moves through is experienced both as an individual speaker and as part of an age cohort.

Issue is that unlike some facets of our identity, our age is never static. It is constantly moving onward. Furthermore, the socio-psychological process of ageing is not fixed. Topic – 064: Bi/Multilingualism and Sociolinguistics

Multilingualism is the use of more than one language by a single individual or community. In the popular imagination and in linguistic theory, multilingualism is often assumed to be an anomalous, exceptional practice. Monolingualism, on the other hand has been taken as the natural human condition. Yet, both historically and currently, most of the world's communities and a majority of speakers are multilingual to a greater or lesser extent.

The biblical story of Babel suggests a much older distrust of multilingualism in the Western tradition. A single, universal language was seen as the gift of paradise, while linguistic diversity and hence the need for multilingualism were presented as divine punishment for human arrogance. In the contemporary world, increasing flows of migrants, tighter economic ties across the globe and the formation of multinational units such as the European Union undermine the nation state and its legitimating ideologies. There is increasing recognition of the high incidence and practical advantages of multilingualism.

Topic – 54: What Is Jargon?

The special words or expressions used by a profession or group that are difficult for others to understand. The type of language that is used in a particular context and is not be well understood outside that context. The context is usually a particular occupation (that is, a certain trade, profession, or academic field), but any in-group or social group to which a person psychologically identifies as being a member, can have jargon. The main trait that distinguishes jargon from the rest of a language is special vocabulary including some words specific to it, and often different senses or meanings of words that out-groups would tend to take in another sense and misunderstand. Jargon is thus "the technical terminology or characteristic idiom of a special activity or group". Most jargon is technical terminology, involving terms of art or industry terms, with particular meaning within a specific industry. A main driving force in the creation of technical jargon is precision and efficiency of communication when a discussion ranges from general themes to specific, finely differentiated details without circumlocution.

A side-effect of this is a higher threshold for comprehensibility, which is usually accepted as a trade-off but is sometimes even used as a means of social exclusion (reinforcing ingroup-outgroup barriers) or social aspiration (when intended as a way of showing off). Many examples of jargon exist because of its use among specialists and subcultures alike.

Topic – 070: Hybridization

Language hybridization, as the very word 'hybrid' indicates, refers to the process of the fusion of two languages. In fact language hybridization is a product of code-mixing. Maschler (1998) defines code-mixing or a mixed code as using two languages so that "a third, new code emerges, in which elements from the two languages are incorporated into a structurally definable pattern". In other words, when two codes are mixed, they constitute a third code that has structural characteristics special to that new code. Bakhtin (1981) asserts, "an utterance that belongs, by its grammatical and compositional markers to a single speaker, but that actually contains two utterances, two speech manners, two styles, two 'languages,' two semantic and axiological belief systems" is language hybridization. Society impinges on language in various ways. In fact, the very existence of languages critically depends on the availability of a social group who claims a variety as their own and maintains its distinctiveness from the varieties spoken by its neighbors. Such a group can be called a 'speech community' and the conventions they share about their speech variety can be called 'communicative competence'.

The notions of 'speech community' and 'communicative competence' are fundamental to understanding the ways in which social groups organize their linguistic repertoires. A speech community is not necessarily coextensive with a language community. A speech community is a group of people who

A Tour of Multilingual Practices: Beyond Eurocentrism

Native South America is a good place to start for studying the relations between language territory and culture/ethnicity. In the Vaupés area of the north-west Amazon, between Colo Brazil, the indigenous population lives in longhouses that shelter 4- 8 nuclear families and a several hours' distance from each other over rough rainforest terrain. According to anthropologist Jean Jackson (1974), in the 1970s the native population of 10,000 was divided into over twenty mutually exclusive groups, each with a distinct name and a distinct language that was not mutually intelligible.

A similar role is played by multilingualism at our next stop, Aboriginal Australia. But assumptions about the relation between language and territory are different. It is not uncommon for one person to speak four or five languages in north Queensland, even in areas where languages differ greatly in vocabulary and grammar. Routine multilingualism has long been bolstered by the practice of obtaining spouses from faraway places.

Emeneau (1980) voiced the popular notion of his days that bilingual is a person who has "native like control of two languages". Based on various perspectives of the notions of proficiency and functions, a considerably vast variety of the definitions of bilingualism have been attempted by different people at different times. According to Romaine (1995), most of the definitions are dichotomous such as ideal and partial bilingualism, coordinate and compound bilingualism; and on the continuum of bilingualism refr to varying degrees of bilingualism'Incipient. Bilingualism' that is generally termed as 'passive' 'receptive' bilingualism is the very initial degrees of bilingualism. In it a person may not be able to produce complete or otherwise meaningful utterances in the other language but can understand as they are produced by others (Diebold, 1964).

Emeneau claims that the term can be applied to a broad range of situations. It can be applied to the situations where a bilingual has a native like control over second language, but at the same time it can be applied to the situations in which the individual has minimal knowledge of the second language. Another dichotomy that exists in this regard is that of individual vs. societal bilingualism.

At the individual level, a person can be bilingual irrespective of any social, political or cultural

Topic- 071: Social Class as a Social Correlate

Social class is a central concept in sociolinguistic research, one of the small number of social variables by which speech communities are stratified. Trudgill(1974) asserts, "most members of our society have some kind of idea, intuitive or otherwise, of what social class is," and both specialists and laypeople agree. Social class is often defined in an ad hoc way which is very ironic because it is a very important variable in sociolinguistic studies. Despite the lack of a consensus of definition of social class it is a significant term in Sociolinguistics.

Social class is a measure of status which is often based on occupation, income and wealth, but also can be measured in terms of aspirations and mobility. There are certain theoretical considerations in this regard in modern times that are sparked by the dramatic reorganization of society and have resulted from the industrial revolution during the 2nd half of the eighteenth century. The notion of social class has certain intellectual basis in theories of social and political economies dating from the nineteenth century. Theories of social class are associated with figures like Karl Marx and Max Weber. The term sociology was coined in 1838 by Auguste Comte, a French philosopher and social reformer.

Nearly a century and a half later Wright (1979) quoted Stinchcombe as saying that "Sociolog has only one independent variable, class". Karl Marx (1818, p.83) developed the first and one of the most influential theories of social class. Marx drew a fundamental distinction between those who produce capital or resources and those who control the production of capital which others produce. In the former are the working class (Marx's proletariat, derived from a word meaning 'worker') and the latter, the middle class (Marx's capitalists).

Max Weber (1864–1920) is the second "classical" theorist of social class. While Marx promulgated socialism, Weber supported industrial capitalism. He was opposed to socialism. He agreed with Marx that ownership or non-ownership of property is fundamental in determining a class, but he

- 'I'll never do this, no way'.
- I mean mujhay lagta hai woh jhut bol ruha tha
- 'I mean I think he was telling a lie'.

"Since tags are subject to minimal syntactic restrictions, they may be inserted at a number of points in a monolingual utterance without violating syntactic rules" (Romaine, 1995 p. 122). As far as the mixing of Urdu and English in Pakistan is concerned, it is significant that despite frequent mixing of both the languages tag mixing is comparatively less frequent.

At the risk of slight oversimplification, we may say that your dialect shows who (or what) you are and your register shows what you are doing. Dialect is a social form of speaking belonging to a group. On the other hand, a register is used to describe changing how a person speaks based on the situation. Register differences are complex. In fact both are overlapping with other terms.

Criticism: The use of the term register was criticized in the 1970s by David Crystal. He viewed it as being indiscriminately applied to every possible variety of language. Since there is no restriction on the range of application for the term 'register', an infinite number of registers can be identified. "This term has been applied to varieties of language almost in an indiscriminate manner, as if it could be usefully applied

Multilingualism is the use of more than one language by a single individual or community. In the popular imagination and in linguistic theory, multilingualism is often assumed to be an anomalous, exceptional practice. Monolingualism, on the other hand has been taken as the natural human condition. Yet, both historically and currently, most of the world's communities and a majority of speakers are multilingual to a greater or lesser extent.

Society impinges on language in various ways. In fact, the very existence of languages critically depends on the availability of a social group who claims a variety as their own and maintains its distinctiveness from the varieties spoken by its neighbors. Such a group can be called a 'speech community' and the conventions they share about their speech variety can be called 'communicative competence'.

The notions of 'speech community' and 'communicative competence' are fundamental to understanding the ways in which social groups organize their linguistic repertoires. A speech community is not necessarily coextensive with a language community. A speech community is a group of people who often approached uncritically and treated as a biological fact with which to categorize speakers, and against which other facets of our identity are played out. Age is a fundamental dimension of our social and personal identities. Legislatively speaking, it is our age that will influence what we should and should not do. Our age determines if we can vote, drive, marry and go to school or work.

It can influence what types of clothes we wear, places we go, and ways we speak. Our age is clea more than a number – it marks our position in and our movement through the trajectory of life, which seen in relation to societal norms of behaviour, obligation and responsibility. A close estimate at someone's age from their voice quality and their linguistic behavior is quite possible. It suggests that we are responsive to cues from phonetic/ phonological features, grammatical structures and lexical items, and we use such cues to locate speakers in the span of ages.

Life span is commonly divided into four stages:

- infancy/childhood,
- adolescence
- adulthood
- old age

The acquisition of language and of communicative competence during infancy and childhood is a vast area of enquiry. The acquisition of sociolinguistic competence is less well understood and is a fairly recent field of study. Studies show that age can affect acquisition of certain patterns of variation. Payne's (1980) work in King of Prussia, Philadelphia, revealed: children moving into the area before the age of 8 or 9 were able to acquire certain local vowel shifts.
